One more week, seven more days, and we can all breathe that great collective sigh of relief commemorating the arrival of Reading Week. The gloom of February lifts for awhile as we get a chance to step off the academic treadmill in order to refresh and recoup our resources. What we had thought was fatal procrastination now loses its tragic potential, and the pressures of essays and upcoming exams can be forgotten (at least for awhile).

Despite the name, "Reading Week", nobody feels confined within the bounds of the narrow categorization. However, when there is a shelf full of books with uncracked covers waiting, a house emptied by vacationing housemates, and a mug of steaming coffee, relaxing over a book, even a textbook, can be an enticing prospect.

The merits of a week off are numerous. It gives some students the chance to catch up on work that, despite the best of intentions, had slipped by untouched. For the ambitious it offers a chance to get a jump on essays or studying. For everyone it offers the potential of a quiet time to evaluate the year and perhaps their academic career to date. It can also provide a time to become totally oblivious to the academic life while soaking up rays in a southern clime or flashing down the ski slopes; becoming so involved or laidback that you don't once feel guilty during the week, despite having neglected the books you brought along.

Reading Week is such a thoroughly appreciated and invaluable break that it makes one ask why there is no reading week during first term. Certainly in a number of disciplines, particularly commerce and fourth year social sciences, half term courses are the norm, and the pressures of the first term are identical to those in the second. The more relaxed mood created by a break would be just as welcome and beneficial during fall term.

The American university system follows this pattern with a less intense first term schedule and more breaks interspersed throughout the year. This necessitates starting school earlier, something Queen's students might be willing to accept if the crush was eased. Trent University has similarly adopted this system and has "reading weeks" in both the middle of fall and winter terms.

The heavy and intense workload characteristic of Queen's leaves many students struggling to find enough hours in the day, let alone days in the week. But it is the mental strain, the pressures that mount when essays, assignments, and exams begin that needs to be relieved. Reading week does just that.

Library technicians picket for input into service cuts

Threat of job-cuts incite picket

John Baktis

A group of technicians from the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Local 1302 stages an informational picket line Wednesday outside Douglas Library. The main thrust of the demonstration was to inform the students about the effect of cutbacks on both library staff and service and to criticize the lack of technician and student input in the library administration's budget decisions.

"We're trying to inform the students of cutbacks and their effects because the library administration has taken no steps to inform the students themselves," said Linda Dumblenton, President of the CUP Local 1302. "We realize that there have to be cutbacks but there has been no input from us or the students as to where the services should be reduced," she added.

"We are fighting to have some input and by not granting us this service, they are defying what is written in the union agreement," said Dumblenton. "I would recommend taking it to a grievance board but that will have to be discussed with union management."

Both the placards being carried and the pamphlets handed out by the technicians showed a concern for the lowering of staff and the subsequent increase in workload and backlog. The Local 1302 accuses library management of being "irresponsible" and "undermining" in their actions in dealing with the 4% increase in budget slated for next year.

"We are on the front lines of library service and when cutbacks take effect we will take the front line of the back," said Maureen, Chief Steward at Douglas.

The Local 1302 wants to maintain a high level of service to library patrons but according to one technician, "the services aren't up to par as it is and cutbacks will make things worse so we would like to have more input into the situation."

However Mrs. M. McBurney, Chief Librarian states that all levels of the library were consulted for suggestions.

"They certainly did have input," said McBurney. "The problem of the budget was discussed at all levels within the library from the technicians to the senior management. They have had an

Binhammer team discusses plans for upcoming year of office

Rob Southcott

After their election victory last week, AMS Executive-elect Richard Binhammer, Susan Morris and Jeff Beck were interviewed by The Journal. The three were questioned about their immediate and long-range policy plans and about what they thought of current AMS Affairs.

The Binhammer team spoke about their stance on continuing government cutbacks first. "We want to deal with cutbacks on the home front, while continuing to pressure the government," stated Binhammer.

"Since we're convinced that they're going to keep on with their process, we're talking about a student aid scheme that uses interest off AMS funds."

According to Beck, this scheme would take interest payments from the AMS accounts and use it for financial assistance to certain students, especially in the possibility of continued tuition increases. The team is concerned about the possibility of larger universities, such as Queen's or University of Toronto, unpegging their tuition fees. Morris said the limit for unpegged tuitions could reach $1,300 per year, something which she said could turn places such as Queen's into elitist universities.

The three expressed dissatisfaction with the OIS. "We're saying that they better shape up, or we'll consider shipping out," stated Binhammer. He remarked that the OIS knows where his executive stands on the issue of OIS, and he doesn't think that the OIS wants to lose the $15,000 that Queen's pays to them each year. Binhammer said that, though he is willing to help to work and change the OIS, he considers their present finances, communications with campuses and organization to be "a disaster".

The Executive-elect were asked about the switch from March 1 to May 1 for the takeover of the MS employees. Inner Council and budget Binhammer stated though he considered the scheme to be good ideally, he is skeptical about it actually working. "I'm hesitant about how two executives will work together," he commented, suggesting the overlapping executives might end up working against each other rather

2 Million for Mac-Corry

Principal Watts has announced that the Ontario government is awarding Queen's a grant of $2 million to help pay for the construction costs of Mackintosh-Corry Hall.

The grant, from the Ministry of Colleges and Education, brings total government funds for Mac-Corry to $3,232,000 of the total $6 million the building cost to construct in 1974. Though the grant has been awarded to offset the university's costs for Mac-Corry's construction, the funds will go towards the interim financing for completing part of Botterell Hall. The addition to Botterell Hall, which will house the Department of Microbiology, is eventually to be paid for by the provincial Ministry of Health. In addition to that grant, the university administration still expects further funds from the provincial government to help pay for the $3 million debt that remains on Mac-Corry.

Exec. turnover changes

Rob Southcott

At their meeting on Thursday, Jan. 25 AMS Outer Council passed motions to change the date of commencement next year, change the date when AMS officers take office and when the AMS fiscal year ends.

The motions recommend that May 1 should become the date when AMS Executive and Commissioners take office, and should also be the date for the start of the budget year and the start of the contracts for employment of Student Managers and Staff of AMS Services.

At present, these three changes all occur on March 1, which has posed problems for commissioners who inherit the old administration's projects. This forces new Commissioners to sign checks for activities after March 1 that were planned by former Commissioners. By moving the date, the committee hopes that budgeting for each year can be more effectively separated from that of the previous year's.

In addition, Outer Council also agreed to have the new Executive sit as voting members on Outer Council when they take office on March 1. The former Executive will remain on Inner Council until May 1, and eliminate the new Executive's need to deal with items and finances already set by the former Executive.

Against great odds...

A Queen's economics grad, who completed his four years here confined to a wheelchair, has been appointed Rehabilitation Services Co-ordinator for the Province of Ontario.

Robert Waterhouse, paraplegic as the result of a diving accident in 1939, concentrated on economics management courses while at Queen's from 1954-58.

Established under the provincial secretariat for social development, the rehabilitation services department seeks to "effectively integrate rehabilitation policy, planning and services throughout the Ontario government."

Mr. Waterhouse's new responsibilities include making recommendations to the government for increased employment of handicapped persons and identifying gaps and duplications in present programs. He will be assisted by an interministerial team of rehabilitation co-ordinators representing the ministries of Colleges and Services, Community and Social Services, Education, Correctional Services, Health, Housing, Labour, Transport and Communications and the Workman's Compensation Board.

For his Commissioners, Binhammer said that he is looking for well-rounded people who would be concerned with areas of the AMS that would even be outside their commissions. "They aren't going to be narrow bureaucrats that just look after their commissions," said Binhammer. "They're going to have something to say on the other things, through Inner Council and by providing information to Outer Council."

Beck indicated that when he prepares next year's budget, the various commissions will be evaluated as to whether their functions and Commissioners can justify their share of AMS funds.

The three also expressed their views on AMS Outer Council. They said they were against reducing the size of Outer Council, though they did support the idea of making it necessary for Outer Council members to be associated with an AMS commission or committee.

"It makes being on Outer Council more concrete than just every other Thursday night," said Binhammer.

Finally, the team was asked about their ideas on academic tenure. Morris explained they believed strongly in student involvement on tenure decisions and tenure decisions should be generally reassessed. "I think that in a number of years, we could have a very stagnant faculty because most of them will be tenured. My idea of tenure is something that's special and shouldn't be expected," said Morris. She added that instead of tenure being almost automatic for those professors who have taught for 6 years, it should be something that is based more on excellence in teaching.

Eng Soc pursues vandals

Shelly Matson

The "few irresponsible individuals" who caused damage to university buildings following the Engineering '82 Record Smoker last Saturday will receive no mercy from the Engineering Society, according to a statement released by the society's executive Wednesday.

The statement said the Clark Hall Pub will be closed until February 28 to allow a complete review of the Society's operating policy, and to ensure that in the future these sorts of problems will not recur.

Referring to the damages last Saturday, Eng. Soc. "will reimburse the University for the damages caused by Science '82 students, and then distribute the costs internally, to individuals if possible."

Don Lindsay, the Society's newly-elected President, told the Journal Eng. Soc. would be meeting with Science '82 late Wednesday evening. He hopes "those responsible will come forward on their own or on peer pressure. The precedent was set by Science '80 last year. But, quite honestly, we'll probably only get two or three, at the most."

Lindsay added that the Vice-principal of Resources, J.A. Bennett doesn't think Science '82 alone is responsible because of the widespread nature of the damages. For example, a double-paned window in Botterell Hall was also broken last Saturday; replacement will cost the Physical Plant up to $1,000. Bennett was unavailable for comment.

C.R. McCahill of the Physical Plant estimated the damages at $2,500 to $3,000.

Commissioner asked to resign

Warren Everson

A group of nine students and one professor are demanding the resignation of AMS Education Commissioner Vickie Steele and of her Speakers Committee, in the wake of a controversial appearance by lawyer Mark Lane. A second group has demanded an AMS court judicial inquiry to determine why pamphlets handed out at the speech were confiscated by AMS constables.

The resignation demand came from a group comprised primarily by Amnesty International members. Their protest noted "the amount paid to Mr. Lane was outrageous when contrasted with the paltry $200 which the Education Commission begrudgingly donated to Amnesty International for their recent sponsorship of Dr. Kayiira."

"The Education Commission has exercised a singular lack of judgement, morally and financially. We believe that those persons on the Commission who were responsible for Mr. Lane's expensive visit no longer warrant our confidence or respect. Therefore we call for their resignations," the letter concludes.

Education Commissioner Vickie Steele responded to the attack by pointing out that Inner and Outer Councils shared in the decision to bring Lane to Queen's. She said the amount paid Lane was largely irrelevant to the dispute. "If you decide it's worth bringing someone in, whether you pay him $10 or $10,000, you're still paying him so he's still exploiting. If they're just concerned about the money, I might argue because you've got to pay the terms you are faced with."

Pointing out that Lane was booked through an agency, Steele said that he was no more expensive than the average speaker. "I would estimate that the average cost for a speaker is about $4500 when you are dealing through an agency."

Steele said she would have liked to give Amnesty International more for their speaker, but pointed out that she was under tight budget restraints at the end of the year. "We worked it out so that the Speaker's Committee would give them $150 and my commission would donate $50."

The second protest centres around the actions of AMS constables at the Lane speech in Grant hall. The constables were confiscating leaflets at the door, on the instructions of AMS Vice President John Lopman.

"That our right to freedom of speech and information as well as that of every individual attending the lecture was massively violated is clear. What is now clear is how and why this occurred," the group said in an open letter to the AMS Chief Justice.

Koopman and AMS President Dave Brown have responded with letters blaming the incident on a breakdown of communication between Koopman and the constables on duty.

opportunity and presently have an opportunity to make suggestions."

"The union has made good suggestions for changes and we are taking them into consideration," McBurney added.

One way to deal with the cutback is to establish redundant positions, in that some positions, which are not occupied now will not have to be filled next year. This way, according to McBurney, within 6 months the library will have been able to place everyone who is currently employed in a position that is not redundant. This way no one will be laid off.

"We don't anticipate that we will have to lay off people at all unless there is a change in budgeting, which I don't foresee," said McBurney. "It's a very tough fact of life we're having to deal with and we're trying to do it with as little negative impact on people and as little negative impact on service as possible," she added.

The library is currently having Senate Library Committee discussions and it meets with the Union Management Committee every other week in which suggestions are made, considered, and possibly implemented.

The weather was cold but the issue is hot as library technicians braved the elements during their informational picket last Wednesday.

The worried Lane?

Stormy visit from Lane brought threats, protests and theories

Jonestown was an experiment that failed because of infertile soil. The violence that erupted in the colony was a result of the untimely intervention of American administration. The presence of Congressman Leo Ryan prevented the colony from dying a natural death and resulted in unnecessary tragedy. This was the message delivered Monday evening by lawyer Mark Lane to an audience of approximately 600 people in Grant Hall.

Lane spent three-quarters of an hour justifying his presence at Queen's and establishing his credibility. He spoke for a total of three hours on Monday evening.

Lane related various attempts by the CIA and FBI to prevent publication of anything that contradicted the Warren Commission Report on the assassination of John F. Kennedy. Lane had contended all along that the findings of the Commission were false. He was proven correct in that instance. He continues to insist that conspiracy was involved in the death of both John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King.

He countered accusations of profiteering. "Every penny I've made has always gone towards the Citizen's Commission of Inquiry," Mr. Lane is a director of the Commission.

Timothy Stone had been Jones's lawyer before Charles Garry. Stone was a close personal friend of Jones, and had great influence over the People's Temple group. As assistant D.A. in San Francisco, he "held people hostage by his association with law enforcement agencies." Anyone lodging a complaint against the cult had to go through Stone's office.

Jones broke with Stone, moving the group to Guyana. Lane's initial impression of Jones was favourable. "If you met him, I'm sure you would think he was a sympathetic man. Jones was a man who 'genuinely liked poor blacks,' he liked to exploit them."

Most members of the cult were poor blacks. Lane sees the colony "not as a reaction against American society, but a reflection of it."

"People had reasons for going there. Poor blacks went there to realize their dream." This leads Lane to conclude that Jonestown "was one of the great pioneering efforts made by Americans."

The experiment was successful only in minor ways.

Their education system was better than that of the U.S. Overall it was a failure, however. The soil was infertile, the climate averse.

Jim Jones was ready to abandon the colony. He sought re-entry to the U.S., and investigated political asylum in the U.S.S.R.

Lane related how the colony began to crumble from within. Debbie Blakey, the third ranking member of the colony, contacted Mr. McCoy of the State Department. McCoy visited the colony but was not alarmed.

Then California Congressman Leo Ryan announced his intention to visit the colony. Lane describes Jones' reaction. "He was terribly upset. He kept saying 'This is terrible, they're going to destroy us!'"

Lane, acting in his role as a "moderator," attempted to call off or postpone the visit. He "begged him not to go." I told him everything I knew. The CIA and FBI didn't prevent the visit even though "they knew Jim Jones would see this as a terrible provocation."

The visit was complicated by the presence of the media. Jones believed "They were out to get him." Tension built when two members of the cult decided to leave.

An attempt was made of Ryan's life by "Sly," a cult member. Lane's "speculation is that Jim Jones told Sly to kill Leo Ryan. Sly saw Jones as his leader."

Lane, imprisoned during the 'mass suicide' is adamant that "More than 700 of them were murdered, not suicide-murder." "They were forced to drink juice or were shot. That's how they died."

Lane went on to describe his own escape. His final assessment of Jones is "brilliant in some ways but blind by his desire for power. Towards the end, he was going mad."

Lane's visit was marked with controversy and protest. At the press conference earlier Monday, he threatened to sue the Queen's Journal, along with the CIA, FBI, The New York Times, CBS, and "anyone else who repeats their slanderous words."

A group of students handed out leaflets at the door of Grant Hall calling for a boycott of the event. Lane appeared at the door just before his speech to challenge the students to sign the leaflets.

At the conclusion of his speech the speaker accepted questions from the floor, a session marred by a shouting match between himself and a student. "How can you be so dense? Did you ever hear me say that?" he demanded when told he had described Jonestown as a "socialist paradise."

"I've been talking for three and a half hours. Didn't you hear a word I said?" the exasperated lawyer shouted.

AMS: Sensationalism before human rights

The Editor,

Amnesty International recently sponsored a three day focus on Human Rights, in an effort to highlight the universal disregard of fundamental human rights. Musicians and speakers traveled from Hamilton and New York City, donating both their time and efforts to support the release of those who are imprisoned because of their beliefs, ethnic origins, colour or language.

The AMS Speaker's Committee, claiming budgetary limitations, provided AI with $200 to defray expenses. The balance was made up from contributions and donations by the members of AI and those who attended the events.

Less than two weeks later, however, the AMS Speaker's Committee found some $2000 for lecture fees and an additional $1000 for expenses within its constrained budget to enable Mark Lane, attorney for Jim Jones and the People's Temple, to exploit and profiteer from the tragic suicide/slaughter of 900 men, women and children in Guyana.

Two hundred dollars to alleviate human misery and degradation, two thousand dollars to sensationalize and exploit it. Small wonder why, with this kind of institutional reinforcement, the integrity of the person is treated with so little regard throughout the world.

Lorne W. McDougall,

President,

Amnesty International, Queen's University

Lane's "picnic" for fools

The Editor,

Paul Steep told us not to go, yet we went. Mark Lane had the right to speak his piece, we had the right to listen; the mandate he did not possess was to bore us with his trite observations of the self-annihilation of Jonestown. With an outstanding absence of analysis, and a preponderance of glib narrative, Lane's rambling monologue left not an iota of understanding of what transpired in that shortlived jungle settlement.

The blame for such a poor speaker does not lie with Vicki Steele's Education Commission. The Commission sought out someone controversial, and Lane had that reputation, yet we discovered Monday night that the claim lacked substance and truth.

I went with the expectation that some insight into this mass denial of life would be forthcoming. Instead, the audience listened for hours while Lane regaled them with anecdotes of his liaison with Jim Jones and the ill-fated People's Temple and made the genocidal act sound like the teddy bear's picnic.

Lane's lecture, a euphemism to be sure, did not culminate in the truth, or in any facsimile thereof, his nonchalance and indifference horrified me, but what struck me as worse was the tacit encouragement and credence lent to this travesty by the passive audience who listened and laughed at this man's gall. They are as big of fools as he.

Off-campus extortion

The Editor,

I'm writing in regards to one of the largest rip-offs the Queen's student faces in Kingston. It is the off-campus housing situation that one must confront, one time or another, during his (or her) four years here at Queen's.

Not only are the rents unusually and outrageously high, but we are put in a situation where we have to pay for four months during the summer when we do not even live in the house. Most people assume that it is an unsolvable dilemma or become apathetic towards the problem and just pay the rent as a "monetary sacrifice" for his (or her) education.

But if you think about it, $100/month (which I think is an average rent, including utilities, a student might pay in a 5 man house) is quite a lot of money for a prehistoric piece of architecture that has small rooms, poor heating, and badly needs a new coat of paint. You are also required to literally give away $400 to keep the house through the summer (Don't kid yourself, subletting isn't that easy).

What solutions do we have?

Perhaps we can boycott several landlords or certain notorious houses each year so that the landlords would have to become more realistic. Another answer may be having a university body (either administrative or student run) eventually own most of the high demand areas around campus. AMS Housing is already doing this but the process is too slow. The suggestions I have given however, must be a collective action or else efforts would result in futility.

I'm not saying that all landlords are bad and I'm not sure how much of an issue this is with other students. But I think it's about time landlords, who monopolize student housing, stop taking advantage of the situation and be more reasonable.

That's not funny, that's sick!

The Editor,

Last Monday night, Mark Lane appeared at Grant Hall to speak on the topic of "The Horror of Jonestown". Basically, we felt that his receiving such high wages for an already sensationalistic tragedy was, in short, ridiculous and should, therefore, be protested in the same vein. Our grape Kool-Aid stand at the doors was set up to reflect what we believed to be the poor taste of the lecture. Our ugly and very tasteless stand was designed simply to make people think about the actual horror of Jonestown and how the incident was being bastardized through the blatant commercialism of paid lectures.

We would like to stress that our demonstration was contrived solely by ourselves and that we were not affiliated with any other protest groups present that night. Some people thought our idea was funny. It was not meant to be. Others considered it in extremely poor taste, which was how we had meant it to be. It may have been the only way for some to visualize the crude commercialism of the entire event.

President's redress

The Editor,

I am writing in regard to the Mark Lane lecture which took place on Monday Feb. 12. First of all, the incident involving the confiscation of pamphlets deserves some explanation. Our constables were under instructions from John Koopman to remove placards and Kool-Aid at the door. Unfortunately they took this to mean protester's pamphlets as well. As soon as this error was discovered, I instructed our constables not to remove pamphlets. Subsequent to that, pamphlets were allowed in, indeed, protesters were distributing literature in the rear of Grant Hall itself.

Mr Lane made constant reference in his presentation to dissenters who had refused to sign their material. The original pamphlet distributed was unsigned. However, as soon as Lane made this comment, the protesters signed the sheet, which I immediately delivered to Mr Lane prior to his presentation. Thus, Mr Lane's comments during the lecture itself would seem unwarranted.

Finally, I would like to thank our Speaker's Committee for an excellent job under difficult conditions. Although Lane received mixed reactions, I think most students appreciated the opportunity to hear him, and the opportunity to see him firsthand and to evaluate the man and his ideas.

A feast fit for nobility

Gil Gross

It was an inauspicious setting for a meeting with as dignified a personage as Lord Caradon, to say the least. There he was, at 7.30 on a Friday morning, putting around the kitchen as he tried up a batch of bacon and eggs for a rather stunned pair of cub reporters. Until last week, I had never even met a Lord, far less been served breakfast by one.

Actually, this unlikely encounter in the Leonard Hall Penthouse was a previously unscheduled extension of an interview with Lord Caradon held a previous Tuesday. Unfortunately, half of that conversation was lost due to the ineptitude of one of my colleagues — whose identity will remain anonymous — who has not yet mastered the art of operating a portable cassette recorder. For twenty minutes, while Lord Caradon discoursed on major world issues, the tape "played" without "recording".

Fortunately, Lord Caradon was extremely good-natured about the whole incident. He played along with our awkward attempts to bury the Great Blunder beneath a heap of stammered apologies and half-hearted jokes like the classic "it's too early in the morning" (it was 11.30).

Eventually, we left with sheepish grins and muttered thanks, and a promise that we would meet the Lord again later in the week, in spite of his impossible schedule. (In fact, my nameless partners almost met the Lord as soon as we got downstairs and out of earshot of the Penthouse.) So there we were, my colleague and I, laden with a sacrificial box of chocolates, hoping that the Lord was awake at the ungodly hour of 7.30, and that he would enlighten our minds and fill our stomachs.

He came through on all counts. If his diplomatic abilities had not exceeded his culinary touch, he certainly would have been a cook at the United Nations instead of Brith Ambassador. The conversation was friendly, frank, and delightful in every sense.

Some of those who heard Lord Caradon's lecture, myself included, may have left with the feeling that he is an unbending and unrealistic hand-me-down from Britain's colonial days. Many of his controversial remarks evoked angry reactions in the audience.

Speaking with him on a one-to-one basis, however, we were forced to entirely revise our earlier opinions. Lord Caradon does have some controversial views, but there is no doubt whatsoever that his desire for world peace and stability is sincere. He abhors violence and its causes, and he approaches each problem with these principles paramount in his mind.

In many ways, he seems to echo the ideals that Woodrow Wilson advocated many years ago. Lord Caradon, like Wilson, has a great deal of faith in human nature's capacity for brotherly cooperation. He believes that we are moving into an era of international cooperation and that this will entail a reduction in strife and discord.

Self-induced reaction

The Editor,

In view of the hubbub raised in Tuesday's Journal over our publication of a Sveven satire, we feel compelled at this point to bring out a few pertinent facts and thoughts that may have been obscured by the cloud of rhetoric produced by Mr. Copp and Ms. Notsle (or is it Elston, Laura?).

To begin with, let's start with the conception of Sveven at our regular staff meeting on January 17th. At that time, we decided on layout, form and title and made special arrangements with our printer to accommodate a special tabloid issue for February 7th. We did not know of, and had not envisioned the subsequent addition of the Sveven question to the referendum at AMS Outer Council on January 25th. When we learned of this conflict we decided, as an editorial decision, to go ahead with the spoof issue as planned, believing, as we still do, that such an issue would have a negligible effect on the referendum results. This seems borne out by the final margin of about 600 votes against the 35c levy. Surely it is unreasonable to suggest that we command such an influence over the opinions of the Queen's student population as to have swayed the vote to this extent.

We most emphatically do not, as Mr. Hore seems to feel, find the idea of an arts magazine "offensive" and, in fact, support in principle the existence of a forum such as Sveven. What we do take exception to, however, is the manner in which the request for a subsidy was made and the apparent lack of serious financial consideration which preceded this request. What was so magical about 35c? When was it ever explained what this money would accomplish? All we got was an assurance from David Owen that the investment while such a Wilsonian philosophy may not seem realistic to some — including myself — particularly when one looks at the entire course of history and our present situation, there is no doubt that the world desperately needs its Wilsons and Caradons. It is their faith, optimism, and devotion which gives us hope for a better future when all seems futile. If the means which Caradon proposes would "reap abundant dividends."

It became clear to us on investigation of the costs of a Sveven satire that this magazine was extremely expensive to produce and, we feel, unnecessarily so. The fancy high gloss cover more than doubled the cost of an issue over a conventional newspaper cover. Typesetting ("digital thinking" at its worst, Mr. Copp) is another large and avoidable expense. What it boils down to is that with a couple of cosmetic cutbacks, a 24-page issue of Sveven could easily be financed by the approximately $1,000.00 in advertising they managed to raise for each issue last fall. Indeed, this feat was accomplished by selling only the back and inside covers.

The assertion by Mr. Copp that we were out "to deliberately thwart the process of democracy" is ridiculous and hardly bears response. Our aim was to produce a humorous parody, and most students took it that way.

It's unfortunate that the Sveven people took such little trouble to ensure that voting students were informed about the choice they were making. Was the plan to continue to produce Sveven in the summer? Would issues be monthly, bi-weekly, bi-monthly? All that happened on the referendum was that the students turned down a request that was unreasonable in light of its insufficient documentation.

For faithful G.W. readers, we should explain that we have chosen to write to the hateful Journal only in consideration of the fact that the next G.W. will not be appearing until February 28th. Hopefully the dust of Sveven will have settled sufficiently by then to allow the subject to be dropped.

A "Gross" inaccuracy

The Editor,

As an Englishman I must protest the inaccurate and misguided comments of Gil Gross in last Friday's Journal. In fact, emergency services are being operated in Great Britain despite the ongoing labour dispute. No critical cases are being denied access to medical services.

The comments concerning the labour movement in Britain are erroneous and reflect the usual conservative rhetoric we are so often presented with this side of the Atlantic — not to mention back home by Maggie Thatcher's cohorts.

The Labour party historically owes much of its existence to the organized labour movement, and most if not all the social advances in Britain are due to the pressure brought to bear on Westminster by a majority of the British public through their unions and the Labour party. The fear of illness has been removed by a comprehensive national health system, some of the anguish of unemployment has been removed through unemployment benefits and Social Security payments, the dread of retirement alleviated by the state pension plan, educational opportunity increased by a comprehensive education system and the elimination of many of the financial barriers to higher education, the list of achievements is endless. It would be better to reflect on the positive achievements of the labour movement than to dwell on the minor number of perceived "negative" results of unionised labour.

Let us forget the unions arose to counteract the exploitation of the British working class, and their prime objective still remains to improve the working and living conditions of their members. The ultimate weapon in the face of intransigent management, both private and public, is the strike. A weapon that must be used with caution if it is to remain effective, but a weapon that all workers must be able to exercise. If that means hardship for some it is unfortunate, but must nurses, ambulance men, junior hospital doctors be forced to continue to work in disgraceful conditions for densory remuneration without recourse to some action to improve their lot? If their services are so essential, let that be reflected in the way they are employed and paid.

If only the Canadian labour movement could be as effective and organized as its sister movement in Britain, perhaps we would see some of the inequities perpetuated under the name of "free enterprise" eliminated from this side of the Atlantic.

"Big brother" image amusing

The Editor,

I read with interest the letter in the Journal by Chris Copp (February 13, 1979) in which he made several references to the Engineering Society, and I would like to reply to some comments in his letter.

Let me make it clear that Eng. Soc. only endorsed Sveven to the same extent that the A.M.S. endorses the Journal, and that the editorial content is the responsibility of the editors. You, Mr. Copp, as a former senior staff member of the Journal should be aware of this.

Next, your assumption that officers of the Engineering Society do not like or appreciate "art" is ridiculous. Art is something that not all engineers have a talent for, but that does not mean we don't like or appreciate it. In fact, I do.

In reply to your comments about the "powerful" Engineering Society forcing its views on the weak, innocent arts student, I thank you for your recognition of the accomplishments of the Society. Let Unanimity of yellow-jackets influential in path of destruction

Drew Fagan

It seems to me that when someone breaks the law, particularly in the extreme case of willfully damaging property, the people responsible should be dealt with to the full degree of the law. That doesn't mean having a faculty administrator impose a mandatory punishment upon the responsible parties nor does it mean forcing the perpetrators' year executive to forfeit monies to provide for repair of the damage. It means finding the guilty parties and prosecuting them in a criminal court.

Obviously, the Applied Science '82 members who caused last Saturday night's damage were in a semi-conscious state. That's an extremely weak excuse for the wanton destruction that took place.

Much of the cause for activity of this sort revolves around the image that each freshmen class of engineers inherits. Their fresh week festivities tend to imprint a need to uphold a standard as hard-working, hard-drinking men. Further to this, the purchase of those ubiquitous Engineering jackets has a tendency to induce group solidarity at the expense of individual responsibility. I've marched around in a pack of Commerce-jacketed students and felt me point out, however that this University is not filled with cretins, but with intelligent people capable of making up their own minds. The "Big Brother" image applied to Eng. Soc. by Mr. Copp is laughable.

Charlie Lund
President, Engineering Society

that strong unanimity. Things that you wouldn't do on your own become commonplace once you have the implied support of the clones around you. What we never did however, was leave a trail of destruction while staggering back to residence. Walking around in fluorescent yellow jackets seems to have led those students to believe that not only was it permissible for them to destroy university property but also that it was in some way expected, part of that time-honoured image of engineers.

Last September, I had an unexpected confrontation with the Kingston police when they concluded that my backyard party was not to their liking. As such, the members of my house and our neighbors spent an evening in jail and were slapped with a bill of $2200 in fines and absconded beer. I broke the law, and was quite aware that I was breaking the law, but due to a long tradition at Queen's concerning street parties, felt that it was acceptable. In fact, withstanding the ten to twenty dollar profit I stood to make, I felt I was providing a service for those students who wished to attend. In that case, tradition proved me wrong. In the case of last Saturday's vandalism, the tradition that the Engineering Society does not need outside help in disciplining its students should also be discarded. These actions can only be handled by the proper law enforcement channels.

Koopman explains

The Editor,

On behalf of the Alma Mater Society I apologize to all those who had their pamphlets concerning Mark Lane taken from them as they entered Grant Hall on Monday night.

This was not the result of a deliberate policy decision of the Alma Mater Society, but rather was caused by a misunderstanding. Our decision that evening was to prohibit only kool-aid and placards, for obvious reasons. Somehow this was not properly communicated to the Constables in charge for the evening.

I apologize for any inconvenience this may have caused.

Phoenix to emerge

Dave Duff

Journalists generally seem to have a knack for being very cynical about politics. I have often been told that I'm heading down the same road. Therefore, it may be surprising to some that I've been feeling very optimistic about the future of the country lately.

I know that seems to be a very naive statement considering the tremendous problems of national unity, in particular the failure of the Federal-Provincial Conference last week, and the threat of the upcoming Quebec referendum, but I refuse to become disenchanted. The threat of separation, disastrous as it may be, has actually brought about some positive results.

The most significant of these is that the public has become far more concerned about issues in Canadian politics. One simply has to look at the tremendous sales of A Future Together, The Task Force report on Canadian unity, to realize this. The country has become more aware about politics. No one can dispute the fact that this is a good characteristic for any democratic system.

Furthermore, this mounting interest is bound to lead to some kind of action within the not-too-distant future. Separation? Possibly, but I am more optimistic. The interest in national unity is not that of passive onlookers, but of concerned Canadians who feel that they have a role to play in the debate. English Canadians are becoming more and more aware of the desires and needs of Quebecers and seemingly more appreciative of the Quebecois culture. Anglophones are not following the unity debate simply to see "what happens", but to act intelligently in keeping the country together. One can only hope that this appreciation of the francophone minority by the anglophone majority has not come too late to prevent a rupture in the country. I'm inclined to say that it hasn't. Provided this concern for Canada does not fade, it would appear as though some resolution to the problem will be found.

The pessimist would say that in ten years, Canada (as we know it now) will no longer exist. The optimist, on the other hand, would say that during the next decade Canada will emerge a stronger, more unified, more outwardly and positively nationalistic country than it has ever been. But to realize this dream, Canadians must believe in it. Cynicism will do nothing but aggravate our present problems; optimism will help in bringing about a better future.

Group guilt unreasonable

The Editor

With regard to the damages that were caused following the first year Engineering smoker last Saturday night, I feel that the responsibility for such actions lies with the individuals involved and not with the first year engineers, or the Engineering Society as a whole. These actions in no way reflect the attitudes of the Engineering class and I feel that it would be unreasonable to hold the class responsible.

As in the society as a whole; individuals are assured certain freedoms of action, but if and when these freedoms are abused, the individuals involved must themselves be held responsible. To allow those responsible to remain protected in anonymity and hold the class responsible would only increase the chance of repeat occurrences of this kind.

Swewer tasteless and untimely

The Editor,

I am writing in connection with the untimely publication of Swewer by the Engineering Society on February 7th, the same day as the A.M.S. referendum. It is not that I am against such a parody of the original Swewer, for although I found much of the humour tasteless, (typical G.W. fare), some of it was also amusing.

But when the editors of such a parody insist on releasing it the very same day on which the funding for the magazine is being decided upon by Queen's students in a referendum and when they insist on slandering the original intentions of the magazine in their editorial (whether in the spirit of jest or not), the issue ceases to be funny.

Whether the release of Swewer last Wednesday influenced the vote of the students or against allotting 35c to Swewen on the A.M.S. referendum is now irrelevant. It is disappointing though, to see that there are editors on this campus capable of such acts merely for the sake of a little misplaced humour.

DeGaulle reenactment barred

Colin Brown

"I did not come to Ottawa and Quebec to create incidents. Those who hoped this would happen are no doubt disappointed."

French Prime Minister Raymond Barre during his final Canadian press conference.

One of the major reasons that Rene Levesque is the Premier of Quebec is directly related to incidents like the ones Raymond Barre chose not to create. Charles DeGaulle's 1967 cry of "Vive Quebec libre" did more for the separatist cause in Quebec than any election or referendum could come close to accomplishing. Rene Levesque needed remarks like that to create the emotional gut-response momentum which transcends politics. But he didn't get it this week from Raymond Barre.

Instead, Barre's visit leaves Levesque looking unprofessional and foolish. If he wasn't being politely snubbed by the French Prime Minister, he was being blatantly shoved aside by his federal counterparts.

Tuesday saw him and Barre touring a large shopping complex in Quebec City. Some 3,000 people massed before them waving tiny fleur-de-lis flags and listening to the nationalist Quebec songs of Monique Leyrac. Mr. Barre spoke to the eager crowd and was politely ending his remarks with "merci" when Levesque leaned forward and whispered in his ear.

Amongst laughter from the crowd, Barre continued with, "Mr. Levesque, who is always making suggestions, has asked me whether on this balcony I will not cry Vive something or other. "Well, I ask you to cry with me 'Vive les francais du Quebec'." There was a stunned silence and then sporadic, lukewarm applause rippled across the crowd which, like Levesque, had been waiting to hear DeGaulle's immortal words echoed in 1979. But they were not to come from Raymond Barre. The crestfallen crowd went home, but nobody could have been more crestfallen than Rene Levesque. Apologizing later, he told reporters that he whispered to Barre that this final speech could be a "possible finale" to the Prime Minister's visit.

Perhaps such politically dangerous encouragement was motivated by the Premier's knowledge that the federal government was planning to ignore him later that day during farewell ceremonies at Mirabel airport. Or perhaps he wanted to gently remind Barre that he was going home that day anyway and that therefore, Ottawa could not cut his visit short, as they did to DeGaulle in 1967. However the incident is viewed though, it was a silly thing for him to do. Not only did he make Barre's visit even more diplomatically embarrassing for everyone concerned, but he also revealed a hint of his desperate need for the all sensationalism he can find to promote Quebec's independence.

It is one of the few times Rene Levesque has shown us that he is vulnerable. Not only is he in troubled political waters, but now we see he can make a dumb move just like any other politician; facts the premier can scarce afford to reveal to his electorate.

PQ report contradicts world scientists

The Queen's Journal Friday, February 16, 1979

The asbestos bluff

Joe Vaitekunas

It is about time that the Quebec government re-evaluated their position on the development of its asbestos industry. The Quebec study on health hazards of asbestos workers is the laughing stock of the scientific community. However, this study is being used to strongly push the PQ's development of the asbestos industry in Quebec.

Asbestos is a nationalist cause in Quebec. Before their election in November of 1976, the Parti Quebecois promised Quebecers to take over the asbestos industry.

By processing the raw asbestos in Quebec, rather than shipping it to the United States as is done now, new jobs would be created.

Ninety-five percent (95%) of the asbestos used in the United States comes from Canada, and 80% of this Canadian asbestos comes from the Eastern Townships of Quebec, a region of high unemployment. The solution was simple, and as a result the Parti Quebecois is presently in the process of buying and developing the asbestos industry.

However, at the time of the '76 election the PQ party promised "good government" and also claimed they were concerned about the quality of life, the environment, and social injustice in Quebec. The events leading to the takeover of the asbestos industry by the government contradict the party's claim for concern for the health of Quebecers.

In January of 1978 the Quebec government informed a team of researchers from the Environmental Laboratory of Mount Sinai School of Medicine that they would no longer have access to Quebec's registry of death certificates.

The research group had been studying the health situation in Thetford Mines for a number of years, and had always had full access to death certificates.

Full access to death certificates is a standard practice all over the world where epidemiologists are preparing statistics on causes of death. The closure of the files brought protests from the scientists but the Quebec government refused to yield. Their reason for the change in policy was the government's responsibility to "protect the privacy" of the deceased miners.

The Mount Sinai team went ahead with their study of the Thetford workers, which coincidentally is the first asbestos mine Quebec is taking over. The Mount Sinai crew employed staff to find the living relatives of the deceased workers and obtain permission to look at copies of the death certificates.

This was a costly and laborious task. Many times doctors in the area helped by defying the government edict and supplying the Mount Sinai doctors with death certificates.

On June 8, 1978, Quebec's Minister of Natural Resources Yves Berube released a news report on the health situation in the Quebec asbestos industry. The government study, completed in 1976, showed that only 2% of Quebec asbestos miners suffer from asbestosis, a fatal lung disease. No reason was given for the delay of two years in the release of the study.

Three weeks later at the International Conference on Health Hazards of Asbestos Exposure, Dr. William J. Nicholson of the Mount Sinai School of Medicine released his findings:

- In the past 15 years the mortality rates among asbestos workers with 20 years' experience in Thetford showed that 1/3 of the deaths were caused by asbestos-related disease;

- the lung cancer rate for Thetford mine workers is 252% higher than the Canadian national average; workers in the dustiest mining and milling jobs showed a rate 419% higher (not that residents of the Townships who did not work in asbestos mines showed a cancer rate lower than the national average);

- the death rate of asbestos workers in Thetford by asbestosis is double the disastrous rate of American asbestos workers;

- the workers showed high rates of cancer of the stomach, colon, and rectum;

- dust levels in the work areas were found to be an average of 400% higher than the Quebec legal limit.

Quebec's legal limit allows 5 fibers longer than 5 microns per cc. of air. The legal limits are much tougher in the U.S. and Great Britain; in fact, these countries are in the process of making them even more stringent.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration of the U.S. Government has recommended a new standard of 0.5 fibers (over 5 microns) per cc. of air. The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health of the U.S. Government recommends a standard of 0.1 fibers per cc.

The scientists at the New York conference warned that these levels are still not safe because they don't account for fibers shorter than 5 microns. These are the most numerous fibers and may be the most lethal.

Quebec's Resource Minister Berube used the statistics of the Quebec government's study showing a low rate of asbestos disease to explain that the Quebec government will not have to spend as much money as anticipated to improve health and safety in the industry.

Berube said the dangers of asbestosis have been greatly exaggerated and the Quebec study made it clear that asbestosis is not so serious as other studies indicated.

The Quebec government forced closure of debate to pass a law that authorized $250 million to set up the Societe Nationale de l'Amiante to purchase Asbestos Corporation of Thetford from General Dynamics. This mine has dust levels higher than any other asbestos mine in Quebec.

Ironically, Labour Minister Pierre-Marc Johnson described the Quebec report as "the most exhaustive study ever done on asbestosis." The study was conducted by doctors who are not renowned experts on asbestos disease.

They examined 6,785 x-rays of workers over the course of 14 months. The study was of workers in the asbestos industry during this time period. It included workers just hired.

It did not account for workers sick at home, retired workers or workers who left the industry after developing health problems. The study did not include cancer victims, although cancer kills more asbestos workers than asbestosis.

The average time the workers had spent in the asbestos industry was 17 years in the workers studied by the Quebec doctors. The average time for asbestosis to show up is 20 yrs after first exposure to the fibers.

In contrast to this report, Dr. Irving J. Selikoff's study on asbestos insulation workers in the U.S. and Canada followed the health of 17,800 workers over 10 years.

It included interviews to determine smoking habits, etc., studied exposure time to asbestos, examined x-rays, autopsies, and electron microscope examination of lung tissue, etc. His report concluded that 50% of the U.S. and 52% of the Canadian asbestos insulation workers died of asbestos-related diseases.

Many other thorough studies from around the world show death rates of asbestos workers ranging from 25-50% due to asbestos-related disease. Only the Quebec report tells a different story. It was designed to.

The story is disturbing. Surely, you say, the media would jump at the opportunity to expose this "coverup" by the Quebec government. Not so. The asbestos story has been well documented by Robert Dawson, the former editor of the Township's Sun (a rural monthly with a very small circulation).

He submitted his article to La Tribune, Le Devoir, La Presse, Le Journal de Montreal, Le Journal de Quebec, Montreal-Matin, Radio-Canada, CBC, CTV, The Gazette, and the Sherbrooke Record. Only the Sherbrooke Record, a small English daily, printed his story.

The editor of the Sherbrooke Record, James Duff, phoned Canadian Press and started to read Dawson's story. They cut him off, promising to phone back. They never did.

The same Canadian Press a few weeks earlier had sent the Quebec government's study out on the wire. They eventually released a very much shortened version of Dawson's story which apparently passed by Quebecers unnoticed.

Dawson visited La Tribune, the French Sherbrooke daily which serves the asbestos mining region. They printed the Canadian Press release of his story halfway through the paper. It was not front page news.

Yet the same La Tribune ran the release of the Quebec government's study on the front page under the headline: "Asbestosis - A Scarecrow."

CBC's office in New York was invited to the International Conference on Health Hazards of Asbestos Exposure where the Mount Sinai researchers released their report on asbestos workers at Thetford. According to Dawson, the CBC did not show up. If they were present, they did not report the findings.

Meanwhile, Quebec societies of engineers and architects, as well as contractors, are being encouraged to use more asbestos. Government contracts are awarded partly on the basis of whether or not the company is willing to use asbestos. The Quebec government has promised us that the new convention centre in Montreal will contain asbestos cement.

In contrast, Yale University spent several million dollars demolishing the ceiling of their main library because it contained asbestos. Following Sweden's lead, the European Common Council of Ministers plans to ban the use of many asbestos products. To evaluate the studies on asbestos-related diseases, the Council first threw out all studies paid for by the asbestos industry and its "friends." Berube and Societe president Daniel Perlstein went to Europe in late November 1978 in an attempt to change the council's plans. This attempt was unsuccessful, as the European Common Council of Ministers refused to recognize the government sponsored study.

Can the rest of the world be so wrong? Can the PQ government be so willing to make money and create jobs at the expense of the lives of Quebec workers - the same workers who support and make up the grass roots of the party?

The asbestos industry can be developed in Quebec but more money must be spent on the development of safer products and the establishment of safer levels of asbestos.

If the P.Q. government does not change its policy then some public pressure must be applied. The media has to wake up and give the other side of the story equal coverage. It is about time they stood up and demonstrated responsible journalism. Even if it means unpopular news that doesn't sell newspapers.

The nones of this apple tree not yet resolved, shaped against the thickening sky;

its grey scales in focus, the heavier branches starting to droop into the empty shadows of the dirt, and a hard white crack for the start of the graft;

with no other movement than somewhere a faint crinkle of distant voices breaking the last surface of this long afternoon like bubbles of cooling yeast.

THE NIGHTLING

It was summer still the days were dark & sullen & I couldn't find a warm patch to sun myself or a piece of ground rough enough to slither into a new skin;
so I lived darkly in the black dream of the bullet's dance the metal marriage of fender & skull or the simple act of valium & waiting; they say it's a self-limiting disease
if you survive it & some days I believe this that I'm wicked & stubborn & "You think so eh? Ya think so?" often now, a figure, naked or draped stands at the window stares into the sad empty schoolyard below spreads and branches in the roots of a bleak grey tree

Bakshi proves he is faithful to Tolkien's kaleidoscope fantasy

by Mark Henderson

An inevitable predicament when filming an epic fantasy read and loved by millions of individuals, is the process of interpretation. The visualization of the narrative, previously realized through language, must involve choice and adaptation at every stage of the transformation from literary text to filmic text. Lord of the Rings cannot satisfy everyone in their conception of how it should or could have been filmed. Viewers must put themselves in the capable hands of Ralph Bakshi, and allow him and his collaborators to create their own transformation of Tolkien onto the big screen.

Lord of the Rings is an impressive treatment of approximately the first two books from the trilogy, a film with magical atmosphere, vivid colours, and metaphorical confrontation. It is actually part of a film, with a sequel being promised in the next 2 or 3 years. While this is probably the biggest problem with the film, I think it can be justified in respect to the magnitude of the project. The expense and time required for Lord of the Rings was enormous, and an attempt to cover the whole story would have resulted in a movie of unmarketable length. Bakshi's attention to detail and mood makes up for this shortcoming. Tolkien's fantasy of good and evil within a mythical dimension is sincerely and poetically realized. The world of Middle Earth is presented in a fashion that only Bakshi could create. When reflecting back upon the experience, he stated, "The only basis on which we could proceed was that of our own integrity, our love for the production and for Tolkien. Perhaps the film won't please everyone but I hope it will please most of the people who loved the books, as well as the millions who have not yet read them."

With those glowing words, who can knock Bakshi? His respect for the original novels is most obvious on the screen, with a meticulously crafted work of impressive ingenuity.

Gandalf: a pivotal figure in the struggle between good and evil.

The film was shot as a live action feature and then animated in various ways, giving a diversity and depth to Gollum, a strange creature who once possessed the all-important ring and became crippled by its powers. Reinforced by his schizophrenic behaviour, Gollum expresses the temptation of evil inherent in the power of the ring. His ugliness and abrupt fluctuations from cynicism to patronization are at once funny and frightening, as he helps two of the Hobbits to their destination. The other major characters, especially the wizard Gandalf and the alluring Lady Galadriel of Lothlorien, are successfully created while avoiding any one-dimensional superficialities.

The meteoric rise in the popularity of the fantasy film in recent years must be looked at as more than just an attempt to make money. As the effects of an open and liberated era fade from the present, strong beliefs in right and wrong, good and bad, become socially pertinent. Films like Lord of the Rings, Waterworld, Star Wars reflect the complacent reassurance that there is a correct and incorrect mode of thought and behaviour. Just because these films foreground their use of special effects and animation techniques to gloss over or glorify an underlying and conservatively-based ethic, there is no reason to malign the efforts of the film makers. Bakshi fuses his message with a style that conveys it to the audience, and the results are superior to other products of the fantasy genre (see Superman). Lord of the Rings is a contemplative and thoughtful adaption of Tolkien's tale, a highly imaginative and entertaining film.

"Watership Down" at the Hyland

Cartoon realism antiquates Disney

by Nick Gray

Animation has been a part of cinema since its first conception back in the late 19th century and the recent release of two animated features points out the versatility of the art. Martin Rosen's production of Watership Down beautifully illustrates Richard Adams' story about rabbits. Indeed, it is reminiscent of that era of fables which portrayed human characteristics in animal form.

The innovative, lucid style of this film places it in a realm above the times put out by that great perpetrator of animated cartoons and features, Walt Disney. Through the years Disney's approach predetermined our expectation and conception of this visual art. Watership Down's different style and new approaches point out the bankruptcy of the rosy-coloured world so often associated with Disney. Everyone can recall Snow White, the first feature animation made by the Disney studios. And since then productions like Pinochio have portrayed with similar style the niceties of the animated world.

This story concerns the adventures of a group of rabbits which attempt to establish a new warren because the old one is threatened by disaster. The group, those who heed the world of the clairvoyant Fiver, is led by Hazel. They travel through territory plagued by death - dogs, cats, foxes and owls of other warrens (owls being something akin to police or Gestapo, depending on your point of view) with the aid of their own initiative and Keehar (the seagull) from the "great Vater". Gone are the Disney pleasantries as their journey is a constant course of danger and death, all depicted in graphic detail.

The strength of the film lies not so much in its translation from Adams' detailed book - for that is a matter of standard narrative conventions - but in the manner from which it is shot. Moving from an expressionistic interpretation of the legend of Frith (god), Rosen's film offers a much more realistic interpretation of the story. The film achieves incredible camera movements sometimes panning 360 degrees in a single take, a rarity in animated productions. The resulting depth of field and changing perspective add to the quality of realism that the film achieves. Moreover, the constant use of close-up and movement within the frame add an intricate complexity between foreground and background and the rabbits' personality. In the final analysis one is hard put to distinguish the animated product from live shooting.

The use of soft pastels in colouring gives an implied understatement and a personal aura to each of the rabbits which is further assisted by the able voices of Sir Richard Richardson, Denholm Elliott, Ray Kinnear and Harry Andrews. This film is no children's cartoon of banal animation. For anyone who has an interest in style and an appreciation of film, Watership Down is a definite must despite its occasional lapses into a pontification of morality. Watership Down is a masterpiece of animation and a superb film.

The rabbits must build a new warren...

Law Revue tickles its audience with unruly slapstick and satire

James Timmins

Suspicions that lawyers are really just actors and law pros are only hams were confirmed Tuesday night as Law's finest performed in the 17th Annual Law Revue in Dunning Auditorium.

Presented as a take-off on a Hollywood awards night, the Revue featured a number of impersonations, skits and dance routines that kept the audience in stitches. Directors Ruth Guzner and Peter Rekai headed up the celebrities who came on-stage to present the Law School's coveted "Bernie" awards (named for Dean Bernard Adell) to winning shows.

A game-show entitled "What's My Crime?" drew hearty laughs as a panel of students acted out the roles of several better-known pros. Quirks and idiosyncracies had been well studied in hours of lectures and students loved this chance at revenge, aimed especially at Prof. Ron Delisle whose crime was repeatedly having flunked nine in a course.

Seven judges of the Supreme Court appeared in black silk stockings and burlesqued their way through a chorus line. Three girls in the grad class lamented their departure and their inability to find jobs in a ballad entitled "Bye Bye Law School." Prof. Tom Asplund, better known for this ability to confuse students with the intricacies of tax and procedural law, appeared and exhibited a dry wit and an inability to sing. He was complimented on the latter by Prof. Don Galloway who called him back on stage to receive a special award - a cream pie in the face.

The final skit featured Superman, a Krypton-born lawyer capable of winning any case, even where his client had pleaded "guilty." Crown Prosecutor Lex Luther foiled him briefly by finding his vital weakness - traffic offences - but Superman came back to win when the statute of limitation ran out; and in the end truth, justice and technicalities prevailed.

Kollwitz depicts the price we pay for war

Madeline Mills

Some of the works of Kathe Kollwitz (1867-1945) are currently being exhibited at Agnes Etherington Art Centre. This show, which has just arrived from the Art Gallery of Ontario, Toronto, is excellent and should not be missed. A German artist, working around the time of World War I, Kollwitz adopts the cause of the proletariat in Germany and Russia. In the often quoted words of Romain Rolland, "this woman, with her great heart, has taken the people into her mothering arms with somber and tender pity. She is the voice of silence of the sacrificed."

Kollwitz's work is depressing and almost painful, but it is very beautiful. A lot of her most moving images are of women and the pain that they suffer when war takes their children and husbands. Such works as Widow I, Widow II or Death and Woman Struggling for her Child, are examples of this subject matter. Kollwitz states in her diary, "I got to know all the depths of misery in proletarian life. The women who sought help from him (her husband who was a doctor), came too to me. I grasped the situation of the proletariat in all its detailed vividness. Unsolved problems such as prostitution and unemployment troubled and tormented me. They were among the reasons for my fixation on the imagery of the common people. Their representation gave me an outlet, made life bearable."

Working out of the tradition of Gauguin, her woodcuts adopt the appearance of primitive wood sculpture. Edvard Munch has also influenced Kollwitz. Her figures, like those in many works by Munch, have crude simplicity and bold form. Her late lithographs and woodcuts are distinctly Expressionist and she exerted influence on this movement.

Though aesthetically Kollwitz's work fits into an artistic tradition, this was not her aim. She states, "Of course mine is not a pure art. But still art... I am content that my work has a goal. I will function in this present time, in which people are so helpless, so in need of aid."

Last of the coffeehouses

Tim Greenwood

For those who enjoy a good mix of health food and folk music the latest word from the Scarecrow restaurant and coffeehouse on Princess street makes a classic good news-bad news story. The good news is the restaurant will soon be open seven days a week eleven am to eight pm, and the bad news, that it took the closing of the regular weekend coffeehouse to make these longer hours. Sparse attendance this year, with an average Friday night gate of 35 people, was given by Bram Fisher, owner and manager of Scarecrow, as the reason for the closing. Except for 'surebet performers' on isolated weekends the coffeehouse will close shortly after next weekend's performance by Willie P. Bennett.

"People's tastes are shifting in what they want in an evening's entertainment. More and more people want bands instead of a single folk singer and a room like this certainly can't support a band" he said. "We've been open for four years as a coffeehouse and the first two or three years there really wasn't any other good entertainment in town but since Dollar Bill's opened, and they're bringing in real good showcase bands, people have that option to go and see a big band."

Liquor, though it failed to keep a licensed Bitter Grounds afloat is freely flowing at Dollar Bill's and Fisher feels Scarecrow's 'dry' status put it at a disadvantage in the competition for an audience.

Furthermore, many of the top performers Scarecrow relied on, like Colleen Peterson and Bim, have left the coffeehouse circuit and Fisher is finding it almost impossible to develop new talent. Using the ever popular Stan Rogers as an example he noted that in the past he could expect new performers to develop a following and have their audiences grow in return appearances. "In the last year and a half," he said, "if we bring in somebody new and we bring them back the next time it doesn't grow."

The price of performers, a factor cited in the demise of Bitter Grounds, is not seen by Fisher as relevant to Scarecrow. "The entertainers have always been very fair to us and being a coffeehouse they don't expect to make as much here as they make anywhere else and they're always willing to play for a percentage of the gate." The performers appearing at Scarecrow for the first time have drawn the most poorly and even the good crowds drawn by regulars and the upcoming Bradstreet performance which is sold out have not been sufficient to recover losses, Fisher said.

The coffeehouse has always been a hobby for him and now that its popularity has run out Fisher has no hard feelings and is looking forward to putting energy into keeping the restaurant open longer. But with plans to have local folk singers playing at meals and dinner time theatre, Fisher has no intention of fading out of the entertainment scene. And the sound system and stage are being left in place in anticipation of occasional performances by 'surebet' performers.

Gym men nationals bound

To no one's surprise the powerful York Yeomen swept to another O.U.A.A. gymnastics title here at Queen's last weekend. With several members of the national team, the York squad is of international calibre and simply outclassed the other Ontario universities.

The real contest was for second place, and here a fine Toronto team narrowly edged out Queen's, leaving the Gaels third out of seven universities in the finals. However, individually from Queen's Brant Waddell, Ron Robinson, Ron Collins and Jaimie Hutchinson all qualified for the national finals to be held in Vancouver in March. As the C.I.A.U. only uses the top three scores from each team on an event, this means that for the first time in many years Queen's has a chance (provided they get the funding) to send a full team to the national championships. Given the dominance of Ontario universities at this event, national ranking is a real possibility for the Gaels this year.

The depth of the Queen's team was demonstrated on Saturday by the fine routines of Ian MacIntyre and Dale Fisher. The O.U.A.A. rules place a limit of six men on each team, so several other Queen's gymnasts had to stand by as alternates. All these athletes deserve commendation for the hard work they have put in all season.

The strength and success of the Queen's team this year is due mostly to one man, coach Jaimie Archibald. By his constant enthusiasm and selfless dedication Coach Archibald has inspired and guided the entire team, teaching them not only how to make their moves but also how to laugh at themselves in difficult moments—a rare talent.

Bball Gaels bounce Big Blue

Ron Jamula

Queen's Golden Gaels assistant coach Geoff Smith called Tuesday night's exhibition game at St. Lawrence College an experiment. Experiment or not, the small crowd at the St. Lawrence gymnasium were treated to a well played basketball game that went down to the final seconds. When the buzzer sounded Queen's had emerged with a hard fought 68-67 victory over the St. Lawrence College Big Blue. The Big Blue are tied for first place in the Ontario colleges eastern division.

Coach Smith elaborated on calling the game an experiment "We played everybody and tried some new combinations. We wanted to give the younger guys some more floor time."

The "younger guys" were the key to the Queen's victory. Starting their first varsity game, freshmen Jamie Pitfield and Rick Emmerson were outstanding in leading the Gaels. With these two dominating the inside play the Gaels built up a 28-18 lead with seven minutes remaining in the first half. The 6 foot Pitfield used his superior jumping ability and quickness to outmanoeuvre the taller St. Lawrence players. The Big Blue remained close due to the good shooting of six foot, six inch Bruce Sheen. Sheen, who has the soft touch of a guard, was good on a variety of jump shots from the 15 foot range. The Gaels, though left the floor with a comfortable 38-27 half time lead.

The second half was a different story. The Gaels again were guilty of a costly mental lapse. With quarterback Mike Kirby taking a rest the Gaels became disorganized. The Big Blue took advantage of the Gaels poor play and with 8 minutes remaining knotted the score at 56-56. The games final 8 minutes produced some exciting basketball. The Gaels started to run as captain Phil Moore triggered the fast break giving the Gaels a 64-61 lead with 2 minutes left. Key hoops by Emmerson and Moore kept the Gaels in command and with 20 seconds left the Gaels led 68-65. A last ditch St. Lawrence effort was halted when Queen's ran the clock out following a St. Lawrence hoop with 9 seconds left till time.

Phil Moore led the Gaels with 14 points, Rick Emmerson had 12 and Jamie Pitfield 10. Bruce Sheen was tops for the Big Blue with 16 points.

Key Notes: all was not bright for Jamie Pitfield. The Ottawa high school grad reinjured an ankle late in the game and may miss the Gaels next start. The Gaels travel to Ottawa Saturday hoping to avenge an earlier defeat at the hands of the Gee Gees.

Swim Gals finish a solid sixth

Judy Harvey-Smith

Last weekend the women's swimming team finished off their season in fine style when they travelled to Waterloo for the Ontario Finals. Queen's team placed a close sixth behind the other teams, improving from their 9th place finish last year.

The meet provided a lot of excitement for the Queen's team as all the team members swam in the finals at the meet. Carla Pepplar gave an excellent showing as she gained a bronze medal in the 100 breast stroke and a 4th place in the 200 Breaststroke. Queen's was well represented in these two races as Chris Dixon received 9th places in both races and Lucy Hewitt-Henderson came in 12th.

Cathy Masson swam well as she picked up three 6th places in the 200M, 100 breaststroke, and 100 butterfly. In these same races Judy Harvey-Smith picked up an 8th and two 10ths.

Cecile Chasson put up a terrific fight in the 800 freestyle and came up with an impressive 10th place. Francine Vickery swam a couple of her best races of the season, coming in 11th in both the 400 and 50 yd freestyle. Catherine Lund and Irene Christie placed 12th in the 200 IM and 200 backstroke respectively.

The relay teams fared well and really helped Queen's on their way to a 6th place finish overall. In the 400 freestyle relay, Diana Harrison, Chris Dixon, Carla Pepplar and Karen Nixon swam to a 5th place finish narrowly missing 4th place by only a few tenths of a second.

The 400 Medley relay team swam well as it came up with a 5th place finish. Members of this relay were Judy Harvey-Smith, Carla Pepplar, Cathy Masson and Karen Nixon.

Queen's had a second team in this event. Irene Christie, Judy McCaffrey, Barb Dalziel and Debbie Lewis all swam well to finish 12th. In the 800 freestyle relay, Diana Harrison, Cecile Chasson, Lucie Hewitt-Henderson and Francine Vickery swam a good race, finishing 9th.

In the diving, Queen's was well represented by Cathy Crowley and Eve Wahn. Eve Wahn placed 10th in both the 1 metre and 3 metre diving, while Cathy Crowley barely missed making the finals in the 1 metre diving.

Promising squash men second

Ron Eastel

The Queen's men's squash team capped their most successful season ever with a very strong showing in the OUAA squash championship at York on Saturday. Of the five tournaments entered this year, the Queen's team won three and was runner-up in one. However, the most significant performance was the second placement last weekend.

The men's championship of Ontario Universities in squash has been won for the last few years by the University of Western Ontario. This reflects the fact that Western are among the top squash teams in North America. Not only do they have incredible depth - they carry seventeen players on the squad - but their top people, Phil Mohtadi and John Leonard, are the best hardball players in Canada. Again this year Western won all divisions of play with John Leonard taking the individual championship by beating Phil Mohtadi in the final.

The real competition, then, was between the other competing teams. The competition was well fought with Queen's eventually proving to be the better squad. The Queen's team of Kim Grover, Nigel Costelloe, Jeff Tory, Ian McKenzie, Paul Austin and Sam Gudewill played very well with Tory, McKenzie and Gudewill getting into the semi-finals and Costelloe and Austin winning the consolation events of their division.

The highlight for Queen's though was the play of the two freshmen, Tory and Austin. Both men are juniors (under 19) and show exceptional promise with a good array of shots plus quickness. What they need now is more maturity, especially in the construction of rallies and in the intelligent use of the court.

Of real importance to Queen's students as a whole was the decision by the coaches to bring in the soft ball - yellow dot-as the official ball for the men's intercollegiate use. This tournament at York was, then, the last hard ball men's tournament. At last, the intercollegiate team will be playing with the same ball that the vast majority of university students use. This important decision opens up the possibility for many more people to try out for intercollegiate teams. It also means that four more universities will be competing next year. This decision will strengthen university squash and add even more importance to the OUAA events.

Thus, with the youth of the Queen's team and the change-over to the soft ball, the future of Queen's squash seems to be on the rosy side.

Hockey Gals favoured in finals

Chris Cuthbert

The undefeated Queen's Golden Gals hockey club under the tutelage of coach Dave Best is bound for York this weekend in quest of the OWIAA championship. The Gals tangle with the Guelph Gryphonettes, today, a club they handled easily during the regular season. In two meetings at Jock Hartly Arena the Gals dropped Guelph 7-1 and 9-1. If the Gals play to potential they should easily capture the semi-final match and move on to the finals Saturday against either York or the Toronto Lady Blues.

Based on their fine regular season play and their solid roster and featuring scoring stars like Janean Sergeant, Kim Ferguson and Cathy Eberts the Gals should be sure bets to win the OWIAA title.

The championship match will be broadcast live on CFRG 1490 AM Saturday afternoon at 2:00 p.m.

Athlete of the Week

After a first place finish in the Novice Mixed Dance Competition at the OWIAA finals, Jane Bracken and Jon Segal have been chosen as Queen's Athletes of the Week.

Their first place finish helped the Queen's team place third overall in the competition held at McMaster. As well Jane teamed up with 11 other skaters to produce the team's only other first place finish in the Synchroized Group Number.

The Athlete of the Week feature will continue in two weeks.

Gaelic football final

Last Saturday at 11:30am, sporting history was created at Queen's as the Rugby and Soccer Gaels battled to decide who would be the university's first Gaelic Football champions.

Teamwork was not a factor in the early going, and scoring chances on both sides were few. However, as the teams became acclimatized to the rules, and the slightly less than favourable conditions, a pattern of play emerged. The Soccer Gaels choosing to rely on their speed and subtle feet skills; the Rugby team, on the other hand, relying more on aggressive play and rapid handling movements.

The Soccer team struck the first blow, managing to squeeze the ball between the uprights for a single point. Their momentum was quickly taken away, and as half time approached, took the lead with a neat shot between the posts.

The aggressive Rugby Gaels came out strongly in the second half, and within minutes were pressing to increase their lead. With their defense looking impregnable, their forwards grew in confidence and displayed a creativity that was rarely evident in the first half. The Soccer Gaels appeared to have no answer to their opponents' clever passing plays and as the final quarter approached, the Rugby team had tallied for four more points. The score stood at 7-1 for the fifteen asiders.

The Soccer team were down but not defeated. After Teves in their goals had managed to thwart the Rugby team's attack with a couple of excellent saves, the team began to rally. They fought back into the game with a couple of single point scores, and with only ten minutes left, finally managed to put the ball between the posts for three points. Only one point separated the teams, and the stage was set for a whirlwind finish. Play moved quickly from end to end, and with only one minute left in the game, the Soccer Gaels were awarded a corner kick. Their last chance to snatch victory. The Rugby defense held out for the last time, and the game was over. They had won a narrow victory over their brave opponents. Tim Hyde, the Rugby captain became the first recipient of the impressive "Too Tall Tree Trophy", the material reward for victory.

Both teams would like to thank referee Frank Troller, and linesman Terry Reynolds for their time, effort, and most of all, their patience. Troller in particular was very sharp throughout the game, rarely being caught with his pants down.

An aura of disquiet

Shah Reza Pahlavi's Iran is now defunct. The mightiest army in the Middle East has been dragged to its knees by a rag-tag army of people, which has matched modern tanks with molotov cocktails, automatic rifles with stones and fists, rallying not behind the mighty roar of an insurgent general, but the soft words of a Moslem relic. The oppressor has been wrenched from his pedestal.

But who will rise from the rubble as the new leader of a new Iran? Will Khomeini's pronouncements draw the country down the path of feudalism? Alternately, will Khomeini's influence wane in the face of radical insurgents seeking a political and economic realignment along socialist lines?

Whatever the eventual outcome, it is clear that the West can only lose much of its former influence. Doubt remains only as to the degree. If Khomeini's forces prevail, indications are that Iran will attempt to embark on a neutral foreign policy. That is no cause to solace, though. Iran's economy has been woefully traumatized by the protracted civil strife. Oil production has ground to a standstill, crippling transportation-based industries; the major cities of the country (Tehran, Meshad, Tabriz) have been scenes of running street battles, precluding normal economic activity. The Iranian economy has virtually collapsed, and there is an immediate and pressing need for reconstruction.

It will become increasingly clear to Iran's new leaders, whether they rise out of the Khomeini camp or some leftist alliance, that they need the aid of external powers in revitalizing their economy. At some point, the need to feed the population and man the oil pumps will take precedence over the desire to remain politically neutral.

Iran is geographically too strategic to be easily released by Western powers. Its northern border stretches across the south-western flank of the Soviet Union, and under the former regime it constituted the diamond in NATO's crown. No more. Yet when economic pressures require external alignment, will Iran turn to the United States or the Soviet Union?

Hostility toward the United States, as evidenced by the siege on the American Embassy in Tehran, and Khomeini's vow to "purge" the country of foreigners, is at a fever pitch. Under such conditions, it is inconceivable that Iranian leaders will bring themselves to Carter's doorstep. As unpalatable as it might be, Iran will in all probability align itself, loosely at first but inextricably so as dependency increases, with the Soviet Union.

This will have a dramatic effect on the international balance of power. Afghanistan, Iran's eastern neighbour, recently experienced a coup which ushered in the present Communist regime. In Southeast Asia, Vietnam and Cambodia now appear to be backed by the Soviet Union. In Africa, a number of states have effected similar realignments. On the other hand, China and the United States have drawn closer together.

It is not possible to glean from these shifts and strains any clear picture of a new balance of power. The variables are too numerous, the states involved too unpredictable. What can be said without hesitation is that the world is presently heading along a treacherous path. At every turn, a threat to peace, once imperceptible, now manifests itself. We are living in dangerous times, and events yet to unfold will surely test the capabilities of the world's leaders in a manner uncommon to the past decade.

Editorial Clarification

The editorial entitled "Image at fault" that appeared in last Tuesday's Journal did not intend to unfairly single out Dr. Bauer of the Mining Engineering Department for "contributing to the aura of protection around Engineering students". Rather, the intention was to point out the impropriety of an attitude existing among members of the Queen's community (administrators and students alike), especially in the Engineering Department, who feel that "we should take care of our own", thereby effectively circumventing proper social channels of discipline.

Have a good Reading Week

Reefer sanity

Marijuana, the evil weed, the deadly reefer, that scourge of Western society. After years of debate, both in and out of political forums, the three major parties have publicly declared their support for the decriminalization of cannabis. Pot has been a major part of the youth culture for two decades now, and some of the members of that culture are not so young any more. It is about time our government faced up to that reality. Decriminalization has become a practical necessity, for the strict enforcement of existing laws has been increasingly hampered by the sheer volume of violations.

Further, the existing laws consider marijuana offenses to fall under the Narcotics Act, which incorporates the more dangerous illicit drugs, while barbiturates and amphetamines fall under the less punitive Food and Drug Act. The proposed changes would bring cannabis under the latter piece of legislation.

Now, the unlucky offender will not be faced with the prospect of a criminal record. He will be able to pay his fine, much like a parking ticket, and not face the hassles of a court appearance, or a jail sentence. It is good to see that the political leaders of our country have finally decided to let old, antiquated laws go up in smoke.

High bacteria count in Pub glassware

leads to changes in glass drying

The Ayatollah's influence is seen in this, the first Islamic wedding to be held in the Queen's Pub.

Janet Brick

Tests of drinking glasses in the McLaughlin Room and Allie's have detected levels of coliform bacteria that exceed the acceptable standards as set by the Ontario Health Ministry.

Tests conducted in October and December consisted of running a Q-tip swab around the rim of a glass just coming out of the dishwasher. The swabs are sent to a local laboratory, where they are rated on a scale of 1000. An acceptable level is under 100.

The first McLaughlin Room count was over 1000, but down to 397 on the second test. At Allie's, the mugs and glasses were tested separately. On the first test, mugs were over 1000 and glasses under 100. Second test the count was under 100 on the mugs, 480 on the glasses.

Paul Kitner, Public Health Inspector who administered the tests, is not alarmed. "The results are questionable at best," they fluctuate too much to be an accurate assessment of overall cleanliness, Kitner maintains. "They can vary within half an hour. If the dishwasher has been running for two consecutive hours, the heating elements aren't functioning as efficiently as possible." Other factors in the mechanical cleaning process are the concentration of cleaning fluids and the length of the wash cycle.

Dr. Paul of Health Services is concerned about the high count. "It's not just those bugs that are there, there could be other bugs," said Paul. "This is a problem all over."

Paul Kitner agrees that high counts are a common problem, but assesses the operation of both pubs as "Very good." Inspections are favourable compared to other Kingston food and liquor outlets, he notes.

As bacteria thrives in a moist environment, both pubs have taken measures to ensure that the glasses are kept dry. The McLaughlin Room has purchased a $350 glass rack, so that wet trays will be eliminated. Allie's has bought 250 pounds of plastic coated metal mesh to put on the trays. This will elevate the glasses one-quarter inch. Thus, future counts in both pubs should be consistently lower, Management spokesmen said.

Fagan becomes editor, explains Journal policies

The past year has seen a major improvement in the quality of the Journal. A higher standard of reporting and writing, combined with an increased emphasis on the use of photos and graphics has made for a newspaper that not only adequately covers affairs that are of importance to Queen's students but does so in such a manner that is enjoyable to read. As editor, my objective will be to maintain this combination of goals so that both the Journal staff and the campus readership are satisfied with the quality of the newspaper.

The major functions of the Journal are to inform Queen's students of the issues that are of direct consequence to them, as well as to provide a forum for the views of the student populace. The News section will report in an unbiased and accurate manner, endeavouring to inform students of the factual aspects of a story rather than attempting to influence the reader's judgements. The Opinions section will be equally divided between regular columnists and open letters, whether they be concerned with campus, national or international issues. This will ensure that all students will be able to express their biases and make for a continual presence of provocative debate on campus.

The Entertainment and Sports sections will be run autonomously and will be, in essence, papers within the newspaper. While the reviewing

Sexual harassment to be studied

Ardith McKinnon

The problem of sexual assault and harassment on campus, currently under study by a sub-committee of the Principal's Advisory Committee on the Study of Women, is the subject of an AMS-supported publicity campaign this spring. Outer Council supported a proposal to aid the sub-committee at a recent meeting.

The issue of sexual harassment has been recently raised on other campuses. To date, few problems have come to light at Queen's because there is no well known established course of appeal. The installation of a tape-recorder and special phone number guaranteeing anonymity and confidentiality will enable the sub-committee, composed of Sherry Galey, Rory Cattaneach and Marilese Moore, to determine its prevalence and investigate possible methods of combatment.

They point out that sexual harassment can take a variety of forms, and is of particular concern to students if it takes place between a faculty member and a student or students.

It may include unsolicited attention in the form of visual, verbal or physical overtures, forced sexual intimacies, or overt propositions backed by threats. A student subjected to this treatment in any form is vulnerable and powerless. If a student is coerced into accepting an undesired situation through fear of academic penalty, she cannot be said to be consenting freely.

The investigation, funded jointly by Student Services and the A.M.S. will, it is hoped, clarify the extent of the problem.

of records, concerts and drama will remain an integral part of Entertainment, more emphasis will be placed on trends in the arts and the general state of cultural development, whether it be concerned with the Queen's Community or on a national scale. In the same way, Sports will provide more in-depth articles on the state of Queen's athletics, such as the funding provided for various sports or comparing the relative importance placed on male and female participation.

Finally the role of the Journal in terms of overall newspaper policy, and in particular, views expressed in editorials, will be decided upon in a pluralistic manner as editorial board

Students forced to move

Noisy neighbour

Doug Ronson

Two Queen's students have been forced to move because the University rented the apartment above them to two Kingston residents who made so many disturbances it is impossible to live beneath them.

The two students, who asked their names not be published because they fear recriminations from their difficult neighbours will move by the middle of this month.

The problem with the new tenants began when they arrived on February first. They moved in between 11 p.m. and 1:30 in the morning. The next week they held a loud party that lasted until 6 a.m. The Queen's students labelled the couple as "undesirables" and said that it was very difficult living below them.

John Richardson, Director of University Housing, said that he regretted that these people had been selected as tenants. "Sometimes you make a mistake and in this case that's what must have happened," he said.

"Richardson said they would be very selective in who they would choose to occupy the apartment above," the students told the Journal.

However, Mrs. M. Nash, former Administrative Assistant to the Director, admitted that the couple were the only tenants available. "I phoned a number of students on our waiting list but none of them wanted to take over the lease in February. The couple seemed OK and were recommended by the previous tenant. Obviously, I couldn't wait too long to rent the apartment because we have to mitigate our losses," Nash said.

Richardson indicated that University Housing policy states that if suitable tenants cannot be found they will leave an apartment vacant.

The students, however, felt that the choosing of tenants could not have been very selective. "If I was renting apartments and these people walked into my office I would put them at the bottom of my list just on personal appearances," one commented. Furthermore, they said they did not understand why the university had rented the apartment to non-students.

Richardson told the Journal that he would take what actions he could to get the youths out of the apartment. "We will definitely not renew their lease after August thirty-first," he said.

Who's Where to be used for fund raising

Deb MacLeod

Canadian Crossroads International, a non-profit organization, has been given permission to use Who's Where to solicit funds for their organization.

Tuesday, AMS Outer Council decided to allow CCI, an organization which sends Canadian students overseas to work in third world countries, permission for such use of Who's Where.

CCI will be able to use the addresses of students in residence, permission already having been granted by the heads of residence and the University Residence Admissions Office.

Dave Brown, AMS president, stated that he was against the motion as the Who's Where is not intended for such use. "The students have entrusted us with their home addresses. By allowing such groups to use the Who's Where we are violating this trust. This might lead to students not giving their addresses to the directory in the future, thus making it no longer viable."

Richard Binhammer, the incoming AMS president, stated that he is against the decision as the matter would be in violation of the students trust. Commenting further, he added however that some organizations, such as CCI are worthwhile.

AMS vice-president, Jeff Beck, said that if the students were given the choice, the majority would most likely agree to it anyway.

CCI admits it used the Who's Where without permission last year.

Universities to receive control of all graduate programming

Staff

Ontario's 15 universities will re-assume full responsibility for planning and managing graduate studies at the end of an interim five-year planning cycle to begin in the 1979-80 academic year. In addition, the moratorium on approval of new graduate programs has been lifted and a more stable method of funding graduate studies is now being introduced.

Dr. Bette Stephenson, Minister of Colleges and Universities, said that she was "not convinced that the existing planning process has been able to accomplish program rationalization or foster excellence." Since 1975 when enrolment-based operating grants were suspended, universities have been receiving grants that were adjusted for inflation, but not for changes in enrolment.

Michael Cormier, President of the Ontario Graduate Association declared, "Frankly, our competitive position is being alarmingly endangered. The Ministry is establishing a set pot that will be divided among the universities, based on the number of students in accredited graduate programmes. However, while there is a ceiling placed on this funding, there is no floor. There is no incentive to increase graduate enrolment."

Cormier added that stronger schools will probably attract students away from smaller schools, especially those in the north, and that universities will base their enrolment goals on "mere speculation."

Capitalism and free enterprise conflict with Christian ideals

Sean Dewart

Monopoly capitalism in Canada is a contradiction of democracy as well as being subject to the critical influence of religion. These are among the comments of Dr. Gregory Baum who addressed over 100 people in Dunning Hall last Monday about political theology in Canada.

Political theology, said Baum, is the theology which attempts to recover the social dimension of religion. Baum said that capitalism and free enterprise have emphasized the "individual" and led to personal religion. People have failed to realize that "the conversion and salvation message of the gospel have a social dimension. ... Salvation is misunderstood if it is examined on the personal level alone."

The capitalism and inherent competition of the twentieth century is "anti-Christian. The power of God could cure society of its non-Christianity... and foster an economic system that included the mutuality and sharing of Christianity."

The churches in Canada have addressed themselves to this problem both individually and in ecumenical statements and positions. Baum cited the Roman Catholic criticism of the treatment of native people, inferiorization of French-Canadians, regional disparity, the oppression of women and relations to third world countries. The position of the Canadian Catholic Bishops criticizes these results of monopoly-capitalism, not from the socialist point of view, but from that of liberal democracy. "Monopoly-capitalism is a betrayal of democracy because of the impotence of the elected representatives against large companies."

Baum's major concern was that in addressing itself to society, religion must be prepared to reconsider its "anti-Christian" doctrine. "People have tried unsuccessfully to graft social justice onto traditional piety and doctrine."

Noronda furor pays off

John Bakits

Students now have input into university investment decisions due to the establishment of a Committee on Social Responsibility in Investment. The Committee serves as a structure through which concerns from the Queen's community may be expressed to the Board of Trustees.

"It's not just a show, we're a for real committee looking at the problem and trying to address it," said Hugh Christie, student Rector and appointed member of the Committee. "The Committee was created to give people a structure to go through and it is eager and willing to listen to concerns."

The Committee was established largely due to the widespread concerns involving Queen's share holdings in Noronda and the company's desire to invest in Chile. The Committee has looked into Noronda, expressed concern and has talked to the company's President

Christie seemed unsure about the Committee's real influence. "We don't know how far it can go, but it's better than the Board of Trustees saying sorry we don't want anything to do with you students," Christie said. "The Committee serves as a watchdog."

The following persons were appointed to the Committee: Mrs. M.
Collins (Chairperson); Mr. H. Christie (Rector); Mr. J. Kostuik; Mr. W. Muir, and Professor G. Rawlyk (History).

The Committee would welcome views and comments from all members of the University community on issues regarding social responsibility and investment policies of the University.

You may send your comments directly to a committee member or to the Committee in care of the Principal's Office.

Quiz returns few and confusing

Eric Evans

Earlier this term, the Journal printed a questionnaire in which students could let the editors know what they liked, disliked or wanted changed in the paper. Of the 8000 papers circulated, thirteen people returned the questionnaire.

Judging by the response, Queen's students prefer the Unclassifieds and Cartoons more than any other part of the paper. Several respondents felt that the Unclassifieds were excellent.
Entertainment, photos and features were next in popularity, although a few questionnaires felt the quality of features varied too much.

Opinions had the most varied response, with some rating it as excellent and others as very poor.
News also received a varied response with one respondent describing news reporting in the Journal as biased.

The Editorial Page received the worst rating, and the most criticism.
Several people seemed to feel that the editorials are biased too often and "propagandised" too much.

The most difficult interpretation of all to make, of course, is what the fact that only thirteen people submitted responses means...

Buttocks which graced benches Reading Week are now in classroom chairs.

Rehab. director selected

Mr. Barrie Pickles has been named director of Queen's School of Rehabilitation Therapy for a five-year term beginning July 1, 1979. To strengthen the link between the school and the university's faculty of medicine, Mr. Pickles will also be an associate dean (medicine).

A native of England, Mr. Pickles 47, comes to Queen's from the University of Alberta where he is professor and chairman of the department of physical therapy.

Before coming to Canada in 1967,
Mr. Pickles was a teacher of physiotherapy at the United Leeds School for seven years. His professional experience also includes a two-year stint in the Royal Army Medical Corps as a rehabilitation coordinator, and clinical work at St

James Hospital in Leeds.
He holds a BA in physical therapy from the University of Alberta, and a M.Sc. from Boston University.

His main areas of research are the effects of ultrasonic energy on blood circulation, and the benefits of physiotherapy to the elderly.

Mr. Pickles and his wife have three children.

The school has been without a director since July of 1978 when Prof. William J. Forrest, director for five years, was appointed head of Queen's anatomy department.

Founded in 1967 by Dr. David Symington, the school has 200 students and ten full-time faculty members. More than 900 applications are normally received for the school's 50 first-year places.

An athletic recipe for subversion

The Editor,

The mass suicide in Jonestown has served to focus international attention on a phenomenon that threatens our very way of life. Of late, various cults have sprung up in Western society whose teachings repudiate our moral underpinnings. The most bizarre of these cults include Hare Krishna, the Moonies and the followers of Jim Jones. Many people have been duped into believing that these groups constitute a real threat to Canadian society. This is simply untrue. The first two groups dress and act in such an outlandish manner that no sane Canadian would become entangled in them. The Jones group is easy to dismiss, since it, in particular, attracts the weak and dissolute of society who conveniently kill themselves off, thereby removing themselves as a threat to society.

Fellow readers, the real threat to the Western democracies lies in the "Earth People". This group is well organized, articulate and spreading like a cancer in the body of politics. Over the past few years they have hived off into various sects which include the "Crunchy Granola Set" and the "Joggers". The former eat bean sprouts, sea weed and the like, often renouncing the use of pretzels, french fries and alcohol. From this it is obvious that the Crunchy Granola Set is renouncing the carbohydrate-rich, vitamin-deficient North American diet. Such heresy! Our diet is the product of evolution and is designed to make us indolent and bloated. This in turn makes us totally dependent on such twentieth-century devices as the automobile, most often used to cruise to the Brewers Retail or to Freddie's for munchies.

The latter cult, the Joggers (an inclusive term covering such subjects as the Racket Ball Players and the X-C Skiers), reject mechanical devices and insist on propelling themselves completely unaided.

The insidious thing about the Earth People is that they constitute a fifth column within our ranks and actively recruit the young and the educated of Canada. Most of the Crunchy Granola Set eat apart from their normal counterparts and are known to frequent such dens of vice as health food shops. The Joggers perform their sordid rites most frequently in late evening or early morning when all right-thinking Canadians are either propped in front of the T.V. or asleep. There are no distinguishing features to an Earth Person such as a shaved head. Most dress normally and exhibit no outward mannerisms that would cast suspicion on them. The only way to ferret out this menace is to closely observe your neighbour, in search of the rosy cheeks of the Crunchy Granola Set or the well-toned physique of the Jogger.

The Earth People have a propaganda machine which spews out some of the most hateful literature since Goebbels. Various runners handbooks have advocated that people jog for fun and recreation. This is patently absurd since everyone knows that exercise is not fun and more often than not causes muscle aches. What intelligent person would engage in activities that cause him pain. The Joggers are obviously into a heavy S&M trip which further proves their threat to society. Some claim that they achieve a "oneness with nature" and even see God when they run.

Any red-blooded Canadian knows the true way to spiritual happiness can only be found in watching fourteen consecutive football games interspersed with at least a dozen beers. If you don't find nirvana after that you never will.

There is just one solution -mcbey

How should we counter the threat of the Earth People to our society? Simple. Sprinkle their bean sprouts with 2-4D and lace their granola with ground glass. Run down a jogger with your car. What if your friends or neighbours have already succumbed to the Earth People? Do as thousands have before you who have lost loved ones to the Moonies. Kidnap them and institute an immediate "de-programming" cycle. Ply them with McDonald's food, copious quantities of beer and re-runs of Gilligan's Island. In a month they'll be right as rain.

A deadly error

The Editor,

There is one major correction to make to the article "The Asbestos Bluff". The average time for asbestosis to appear in workers is twenty years after first exposure, not twenty hours. The misprint may cause confusion as I was trying to point out how the Quebec study was designed to show a low asbestosis rate by studying workers who worked an average of 17 years in the asbestos industry.

Blinkers obscure vision

The Editor,

I am ashamed of myself. I (like many others, I believe) went to the lecture given by Mark Lane fully prepared to condemn him as an impassive hypocrite. My preconceptions of the man were derived not only from the claims of the boycotters, but also from my ignorance concerning the actual events which surrounded the deaths in Jonestown. As the evening progressed my impressions were altered.

It seems that those of us who came with closed minds to hear Mark Lane left with unchanged opinions. Those of us who came with minds open to truth left somewhat enlightened. For Mark Lane did not seek to tell us outright what transpired at Jonestown, nor did he offer a 'trite' or 'glib' explanation of the nine hundred deaths. He did offer us the facts, as he saw them, and allowed us to draw from them our own conclusions. Mark Lane obviously does not believe in reaching rushed judgements; unfortunately, it seems that many of us at Queen's and elsewhere do. Should not both, or all sides to a controversial issue such as this be examined before any person or group of people is condemned? Is the standard in Canada now to be "guilty until proven innocent"?

I do not suggest that we should unquestioningly accept Mark Lane's statements concerning his, or anyone else's, role in the Jonestown tragedy. Nor should we accept at face value his reasons for visiting the Queen's campus. However, his intentions could not have been only to earn two thousand dollars; surely a hastily construed book (which he claims to have been offered fifty thousand dollars to write in the week following the deaths) would have been a more lucrative venture than university lectures. His words conveyed his real intention: to urge us, as students and human beings, to question, to investigate, and to learn the truth about Jonestown, and not to blindly accept what a newspaper, or, for that matter, a lecturer, tells us.

Do we want to know what the realities of Jonestown are? If so, then it is our responsibility to demand an unbiased investigation into the entire spectrum of events which were related to Jonestown. Perhaps the intentions of Mark Lane's speech are not as contradictory to those of Amnesty International as they may at first have seemed. For hopefully this controversial speaker has raised us from our apathy to investigate, and, ultimately, to solve and prevent the situations which lead to such human tragedy.

8 Opinion

Stage absurdity

Gil Gross

While we were off for Reading Week, the People's Republic of China once again took center stage in the continuing drama of world affairs. This time, the directors of the Peking People's Theater Company decided that an invasion of Vietnam would serve as a nice encore to last December's Diplomatic Debut, which was greeted with standing ovations, in Washington, Shanghai, and elsewhere (the show was banned in Moscow on the grounds that it contained "scenes offensive to proletarian audiences.")

Peking's latest effort demonstrated a surprising shift from the light comedy employed last year in an attempt to gain international recognition and friendship to a format much more reminiscent of Shakespearean tragedy, replete with conspiracy, scenes of brute force and large doses of bloodshed.

The tragedy has not been a popular mode of drama in recent years, however. The last time it was widely used was by the Soviet director Stalin, who sent the Red Army Players on a tour of Eastern European capitals some thirty years ago. They were greeted by captive audiences wherever they went, but critics in the West agreed that the show lacked subtlety and class.

Apparently, the mood hasn't changed. Even Jimmy Carter, whose own string of suspense-comedies has left many theater buffs literally in stitches (particularly in Iran), has clearly stated his opposition to the bold Chinese initiative. He feels, as do many Western critics, that the world is not yet ripe for a return to the Sam Peckinpah type of carnage that the Chinese are offering.

Carter's fears have been borne out by the reaction to the show in Hanoi, where an infuriated audience has been attempting to drive the actors off the stage with a barrage of eggs and tomatoes and an angry Moscow community is reportedly preparing an extravaganza to rival that presented by Peking. The high-budget production, a horror to be called "Death in Manchuria" (the film sequel may be called "World War Three"), will feature endless destruction, and up to one billion extras.

The backers of the Peking production obviously made a serious miscalculation. The recently-befriended Washington critics have not come through with the acclaim which would have been vital to the success of the tour. Audiences in Vietnam have been particularly resistant and there is a strong possibility that the show will be driven out of Hanoi before it even finishes its scheduled run. The Vietnamese have become known for their dislike of foreign productions, particularly since their own local talent has proven itself lately both at home and abroad. Finally, the competition from the smaller, but more talented and better trained Russian troupe may just prove too much for the People's Theater Company to bear.

If its backers do not withdraw soon and chalk the lesson up to experience, they may face a very serious financial and professional crisis. If they insist on staging the remainder of the scheduled run, the wrath of the audiences and critics may leave the Company in a hopeless position. The resulting repercussions might have tremendous, though presently inestimable, effects on the entire dramatic world by the time the curtain falls.

The Editor,
This is a request to the students who stole the bench from the Bagot and Thanks to us

The Editor,
We would like to express our thanks to the student body for the great support they gave us during our three-day Blood Donor Clinic.

Again, the clinics were very successful and a total of 1,032 registered, 90 were deferred, and 942 units of blood were received.

We would like to thank everyone who assisted at the clinic and a special vote of thanks to the donors. We hope Queen's will continue to support the Red Cross in the future.

Earl Street laundry. Maybe the spirit which resulted in this theft has waned somewhat and perhaps you could consider returning the bench to where it belongs. One of the discouraging parts of being President of the A.M.S. is speaking to people who are the victims of vandalism, theft and pranks. It is no wonder the tolerance of the community is stretched at times.

The bench probably isn't doing you much good, but the people who use it in the summertime will certainly miss it. Sure, it was probably just a joke, but now that the joke is over, please consider making good the damage by returning the property.

Have you ever noticed that wherever you go, you run into Toronto people? It's true, Toronto people always seem to either be outside Toronto, or talking about being outside Toronto. This is a little hard to understand, because Toronto is basically a nice city. Just ask the thousands of American tourists that visit every year.

Sure, Toronto has its problems - like two of the most inane AM radio stations in the world - but it has so many good points. The city's progressive attitude of having a McDonald's on every block really helps give the city a cultural integrity of its own. It certainly could explain why people from all over North America feel at home there. And why would people seek the great outdoors outside of Toronto when the Metro Park Commission's conception of virgin wilderness, Toronto Island, is just a ferry boat ride with a bunch of rotten little urchins away? It is pretty hard to understand.

There are so many things to do and see in Toronto. At lunch time, you can go down and watch the Bay Street secretaries fighting to remain decent in the downtown wind tunnels. Another fun thing to do is to go down to Ontario Place and look at all the boats people buy so that they can hold wild parties. Other options include paying exorbitant prices for the pleasure of shopping inside the new Eaton's Centre or riding all by yourself on the Yorkdale subway. Or you could go for a drive in the suburbs and see miles or remarkably similar houses. Most houses in the suburbs do have beautiful gardens though - but then they should since they are located on some of the province's best farmland. So why do Toronto people live for leaving Toronto?

The reason, I think, is fairly simple. People from Toronto simply do not have a feeling of allegiance and dedication to their city. To begin with, very few people are actually born in Toronto. Most move there due to transfers or temporary fits of insanity. Since Toronto has no real identity of its own, these people still consider themselves as natives of some place else.

You will notice that I mentioned that Toronto has no identity of its own. It is quite true. Toronto's famous cosmopolitan, multi-cultural population is so diverse that no definitive conception of Toronto is possible.

The problem is compounded by the fact that the city is divided into boroughs. Very few people actually live within the CN Tower (one of Toronto's finer points) Fall-zone. Instead, most people have found refuge and possibly happiness in places like Scarbooke and Mississauga. Even their mailing addresses name these places and not Toronto. This again reveals a lack of allegiance to the city - or perhaps embarrassment at coming from Toronto.

Toronto has long received abuse from many sources and this too can be related to the lack of unity and integration among Torontonians. They simply do not care enough to respond to jabs from all sides, so it is a safe target for people making feeble attempts at being amusing.

I could even make remarks about the Blue Jays, Argos and Leafs, but I would not want to be accused of exploiting a tragedy. Heavens knows I don't need to be boycotted by a bunch of law students.

So the next time you run into someone who claims to be from Toronto, you'll at least know the truth about them. They are probably just another lost soul in modern society who does not know where they are from.

Sharper than serpent's tooth is little brother

Julia Grunau

All of you who have seventeen-year-old brothers will be familiar with the problems of signing off over the phone. It goes like this:

"So you want Mom and Dad to send money."

"I don't care who sends it as long as it has big numerals in the corners."

"Okay. Anything else?"

"Uh...not really. I miss you. I love you."

"She waits expectantly."

"Yeah. Non-committal."

"Yeah what?" Indignantly

"Umhm "Cool."

"I LOVE YOU..." Yelled in desperation.

"What do you want me to say?"

Hurt.

"You pine, you waste, you linger pale and wan without my illuminating and rejuvenating presence," dreams the English major.

"Harrumph," scoffs the high-school electrical engineer.

"I'm not writing home any more until I know that you love me and appreciate my golden prose." Craftily.

"Julia, do you still want money? he demands.

"Yes, of course."

"Well then," he says triumphantly,

"I shall send you an amount of money inversely proportional to the amount I love you. Namely none. How's that?"

Try arguing with little brothers. Just try. Let me know how it goes.

Earlybird loses lock

The Editor,

On 23 Feb I went to the phys ed centre and locked my clothing in a locker in the women's change room at 0825 hrs. When I returned from the track at 0845, I found that it had been cut off. A lock was given to me to replace my own.

Since the activity areas are open at 0800 hrs, surely the staff must expect people to be in the locker rooms after this time. The locker rooms should be checked for locks left on overnight before the activity areas are open. If the locks cannot be removed at the time, the locker numbers could be recorded either just after the building closes or just before it opens. Locks appearing on other lockers after 0800 hrs should be assumed valid for the day and left "unmolested".

memories and premonitions

Lord Caradon, this year's Brockington visitor, is an elder statesman in the classic sense of the term. Among the many senior administrative and diplomatic posts which he has held since 1929, the most notable has probably been his term as British Ambassador to the United Nations from 1964 to 1970.

We were fortunate enough to have the opportunity to speak to him during his stay here. The following selections from our conversations with him offer a glimpse at the man and his views.

You suggest that most world disputes and problems can be resolved through international cooperation. In light of recent events, though, would you maintain that such a course has proven successful?

No. I wouldn't say they've been successful at all. I think we've got a long way to go before we make this new approach to international affairs effective.

At the present, we're in an awkward transition between the old days of national power, and the Cold War, to another era in which the international community will play its full part.

When I went to the United Nations fifteen years ago, the Cold War was still dominating the world. The United States and the Soviet Union were at loggerheads, and anything which was proposed by one would be vetoed by the other. We've seen a good deal of loosening up on that. I think the U.S. is beginning to realize that they can't have it all their own way. Iran has contributed to that.

Now, I think there's a different approach of the two superpowers. They realize that they can't run the world on a negative basis. Consequently, it opens an opportunity for the rest of the world to come in and play a part. It hasn't come all the way yet, by any means. But the new era where international authority takes the place of sheer national power is on the way.

We have already begun to witness some of the benefits of such an arrangement. From the point of view of a developing country, it is the capacity to be able to turn to the World Bank or the U.N. Development Program which gives them some hope of being able to have access to the resources of the world. They can turn, it is true, to the U.S., Canada, or elsewhere for separate assistance, but it's a tremendous relief to them to deal with the international authority.

The U.S. and the Soviet Union, when they give their aid, usually give it for a political purpose, or stop it for one. The great advantage of the international authority is that it has no motive other than that of giving a hand to the country concerned.

You say that the advantage of the U.N. is that it can be politically impartial. Why, then, have you suggested that the European bloc of nations mediate the Mideast dispute, and the Commonwealth deal with that of Southern Africa?

Very often, the best way out of a deadlock is not to expect the two parties to suddenly wake up in the morning and say they agree. You've got to get some reasonable and impartial proposal independently put forward, to which both can say, "Oh, we'll go on that". That's constantly happening. That's the method I'm advocating.

Now, who might be the best initiator in the Middle East? Great Britain, France, and yes, Germany too, have a grave responsibility for all the terrible things that have happened in the past. I don't think that they would be regarded as being anti-Israeli, or anti-Arab; I think they would be regarded as searching for a genuine peace. I'm thinking that they should work through the United Nations.

I was thinking of a Commonwealth intervention in Southern Africa. That is, the Commonwealth members of the Security Council acting together. I believe that the Commonwealth, speaking as one voice in the Security Council and through it, and carrying the rest of the world with it, might be the best way of trying to stop the thing before it goes over the edge.

How would you support your stated contention that Israel "intimidates" her Arab neighbours?

There's no doubt at all of that now, and as far ahead as we can see, there's no one in the Middle East who could challenge the military power of Israel. It's an extraordinary fact, that such a small country, with its small population, is in that position. But there have been a couple of wars, and they've shown that they can wipe out all the Arab opposition in a week.

It's much easier for them to do so now than it has been before. The Arabs are now disunited. The Russian arms on which Egypt depends have not been coming through, and no one believes that Egypt could start a war. And if Egypt's not going to fight, you can't expect the little army of Jordan and the Syrian army to take Israel. Israel would wipe them out overnight.

At the moment, the balance of military power — and I don't think anyone, including the Arabs or Israel would dispute this — is overwhelming. The danger is, that being so, that Israel will say, "That's the best way, let's not depend on anyone else. Let's depend on our own military strength, and no one will dare to attack".

I think, in the long run, that such an attitude, while understandable, is utterly mistaken. My contention is that it is possible to get security in peace.

There's not going to be a long-term peace if it is achieved by the fact that one country is militarily more powerful. This is what I mean by intimidation.

You played a part in a crucial stage of Middle East history during your service in Palestine in the '30s. How did British policy at the time shape events then, and subsequent developments?

When I arrived in Jerusalem fifty years ago, it was the week of the "Wailing Wall Riots". I knew nothing of what was going on, except what people told me. There had been comparative peace in the Holy Land for the previous ten years or so, but they told me that it was going to boil over now, and that there might even be "disorder"! They didn't know what was coming.

That Friday it came. I was amazed at what was going on; I had just come, I was twenty-one years of age, and we heard the roar of the mob coming out of the Mosque of Omar after the midday prayer.

They came out through the Damascus Gate, where I was, chanting with a sort of rhythmic fury that I was to get to know very well in later years of riot and rebellion in what was then Palestine.

I had come to be the most junior official in the British Administration. Obviously, I could be of no help. They gave me a gun and sent me out with the police to try to protect the Jewish settlements. The worst disorder was in Safed and Hebron. In Hebron, the mob went right down the main street, killing everyone, man, woman, and child. That was my first week or two.

My next job was to be in charge of Samaria, which is a big area of Palestine. I was there for six or seven years, as a youngster in my twenties, in charge of the area where the main Arab rebellion took place. That was an extraordinary time. It was rough!

They killed my neighbouring district officer in Nazareth, and then, when I was eventually removed in 1938, they immediately killed my successor. They shot him in his office. We were fighting a rebellion, and I think we fought fairly clean.

Palestine in those days was a little backwater, really. It suddenly became important with these riots, and then got much more important when the horrors of Europe drove out tens, hundreds of thousands of Jews, seeking safety.

The dilemma of the British government was that, if we let them all come, there would be very serious Arab resistance. But if they were refused entry, there would be great international feelings that these poor people were not being given a just opportunity.

It was a very grave dilemma indeed. We were in charge, and consequently, when things went so bad, we were responsible for the result. I've never known, even looking back many years later, what the right answer should have been.

Certainly, I don't think it would be one extreme or the other. We tried to have a middle course, and got the worst of both worlds.

Outlook: for kids, a breath of fresh air

by Tim Turner

The work week is finally over. The battle has abated somehow, if only in my imagination. It's Friday afternoon and anything academic has been shelved as I set my sights on another winter camp with Outlook. The promise of sleep which of lately has been in short supply causes me to ponder. A winter camp is a semi-hibernation in terms of the time spent on your back, fidgeting and wondering if the sun will ever rise. Life, I guess at the other extreme.

It's going to be good just getting away from this place and slipping into a new mentality. With kids it's which if he goes is left to his father and suddenly things fall into perspective. He packs a heavy sweater, some extra socks a toothbrush and heads off to the Outlook office.

Elsewhere Dale, 15, can't wait to get going. School is a bore but he's resigned to the fact of putting in one more year. In the excitement and rush of the afternoon he forgets his cigarettes.

The winter camp weekends, six of which are run between Jan. and March, bring together Outlook staff

So why do we do it? What good is it? Does it teach you anything? Like determination? invention? improvisation? foresight? hindsight? love? art? music? religion? Strength or patience or accuracy or quickness or tolerance or which wood will burn and how long is a day and how far is a mile and how delicious is water and smoky green pea soup?
-R. Russell in 'On the Loose'

Oooaahh! — one of arm wrestles, roller disco, morning paper routes, "dumb" teachers, rock concerts and old camp trips. Mix in a little supervision and a generous portion of delegation and by Sunday you've got ten beaming faces and a unanimous urge to do it again.

That's Sunday remember. Let's pretend it's still Friday and on the other side of town Peter, 14, one of the 7 boys going out is having second thoughts. Weather on the radio is calling for one of the coldest weekends of the year. He thinks back to the Outlook canoe trip last August with relish and realizes that this time he's in for something different. If it just weren't so darn cold. Then he remembers his 6am paper route and a wide assortment of Kingston kids, between the ages of 13 and 16.

The meeting ground is the Outlook Office, Room 231 in the John Deutsch Centre. A beehive of activity on Friday afternoon the Office outfits the group with everything from food and clothing, to equipment and other assorted paraphernalia for the oncoming weekend.

Bring in the kids and all of a sudden there are boots that won't fit, sleeping bags that won't roll up, packs that are toooo big — a myriad of wrinkles that all have to be ironed out before the preparations are complete and the trip is ready to head out.

Once this pile of packs, sleeping bags, toboggans, lanterns and snowshoes is modified to fit the inner dimensions of the Outlook van, 10 (plus or minus) adventurous souls climb in and look for breathing holes. This done, another Outlook trip is on

An exercise in exasperation: stuffing a sleeping bag

Staff and camper making sense of local geography.

An Outlook weekend leaves a number of memorable imprints. Initially the kids are not the most cooperative lot. In the beginning, teamwork means making sure you've got one of the lightest packs, the best pair of snowshoe harnesses, the first cup of hot soup and/or the most advantageous spot by the fire.

In time, it's encouraging to see these attitudes being replaced by an enthusiasm to reach out and help the next guy. Ever been served hot grape koolaid in bed by a boy who the day before might have muscled in ahead of you for an extra cup of soup? I have.

From the outset, you learn to contend with a mixed bag of profanity, impatience and hyperactivity. Some like to project themselves as incarnations of Charles Bronson but the image gradually crumbles as they let down their guard appreciating the rest of the group as friendly rather than threatening. It's great to see how when given responsibility reinforced with encouragement a boy's attitude and outlook on things can come right around. Out of doors and out of Kingston these guys are different people. Sometime it only takes a conversation — something that will impress on him that you're his friend — someone who'll sit and listen not in judgement but with empathy and humility. A friend, not a supervisor or counsellor. Outlook gives students the opportunity to bridge that gap. To enter another world and to really enjoy what the other has to offer.

Every year, about 200 Kingston-area kids discover what Outlook is and invariably through either a canoeing or a snowshoeing experience, discover that once is nowhere near enough.

Interested in ten day or weekend tripping with Outlook this summer? Drop by the Outlook office, room 231 of the Student Union or call 544-6444 anytime.

Authenticity enhances story

The Brinks Job

Mark Henderson

Movies based on famous historical events are always confronted with the major obstacle of trying to generate suspense or mystery when the final outcome is known to practically everyone. A much more fruitful approach is to try and capture the mood and atmosphere of the period, a tactic The Brinks Job attempts with varying degrees of success. Starring Peter Falk, Peter Boyle and Warren Oates, The Brinks Job pleasantly recreates the lives and surroundings of a group of petty thieves who manage to pull off one of the largest cash thefts in U.S. history. William Friedkin has wisely chosen to accentuate detail and architectural authenticity and his direction rarely protrudes into the story in an overt or irritating fashion.

Unfortunately, what could have resulted in a charming, small-scale comedy-drama is seriously weakened by Friedkin's frequently misguided attempts to be profound. The social milieu of downtown Boston is suddenly subverted and the film switches to a national scale once the crooks have been apprehended. Granted, these men became overnight celebrities, proletarian folk heroes, but the structure and scope of The Brinks Job isn't strong or large enough to contain Friedkin's liberal social views. Sheldon Leonard plays FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover and his hysterical accusations of a Communist conspiracy behind the Brinks heist are out of place in the film. The development up to this point stresses the crooks' difficulty in adjusting to their new found wealth, and to drop this angle to concentrate upon the anti-Communist mood of the era is too much of an "about-face" If it was to work, the national element should have been introduced much earlier, before a solid direction was established.

The Brinks Job achieves a good measure of engaging frivolity with the attention it gives to recreating the actual locations and staging of the robbery. Peter Falk portrays a small-time restaurant owner who caters to various friends and associates in the neighbourhood. He deals stolen goods in his basement, and comes upon the idea to hit the Brinks vaults merely by chance. A series of short scenes allow the social environment of the men involved to be nostalgically observed, the old houses, cars, street lamps, and signs immaculately faithful to the time period (approx. 1950). Falk displays considerable talent at playing (non-Columbo) comedy in these scenes and his first venture into the supposedly infallible Brinks building. Peter Boyle is delightful as a thick-headed money man who organizes the business side of the operation, and Warren Oates is great, as always.

It seems that the desire for film makers to produce historically situated heist films is becoming increasingly popular. The Brinks Job has many similarities to the current Great Train Robbery, but its approach is more plausible and it doesn't romanticize its characters in the smug manner of the latter film. The Brinks Job emerges as a well made and occasionally impressive movie. Its slow pacing and determination to convince us through authenticity make it a worthwhile effort.

Kain and Augustyn create magic

Brent Lavictore

Like rare bookends, the value of Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn as two of the world's greatest classical dancers increases threefold when they are presented as a set. During the February 22nd National Ballet performance of Swan Lake at Toronto's O'Keefe Centre, Kain and Augustyn again demonstrated the incredible rapport which has developed between their two talents.

After a shaky first act (the Villagers encountered some problems with the fast paced choreography during the village celebration when some of the more intricately timed movements were attempted in two little space, creating near collisions and awkward movements, the ballet entered a surreal realm when the swans took the stage amidst dry-ice mist and a beautifully fantastical moonlight set. The perfect symmetry and synchronization of the swans seemed impossible at times, the magic was astounding. Especially during their lengthy entrance and exit, on a raised platform embroidered with clouds, at the back of the stage, the swans appeared to be carried on a mystic wind.

During the Black Swan pas de deux of the Second Act, Kain and Augustyn shone. Particularly brilliant were Augustyn's enormous grande jete sequence and Kain's thirty-two fouettes at the scene's climax; both brought amazed gasps from the entire audience. Kain's performance as the Black Swan was aggressive and flawless, she emitted great confidence, devilish charm and tireless perfection during this entire, greatly demanding scene, regarded by many as the supreme test for any female lead. Few dancers in the world, past or present, are capable of the charismatic performance expected from Kain; no one could have been disappointed with her display of sheer talent during this production of Swan Lake.

Several other dancers highlighted the show with brief but remarkably brilliant routines. Yolande Auger, as one of the clowns in Act II Scene I, brought further amazed gasps from the patrons with her display of flexibility beyond feasible limits (try standing on the toes of your left foot while slowly bringing your right foot up to touch the back of your head). Also, the Little Swans, Colleen Cool, Annette Lambros, Daphne Loois and Cynthia Lucas, during their pas de quatre, a series of complicated, demanding releve and bourees, performed effortlessly, exciting the entire audience, they appeared as a multiple image of a single swan.

As always, the set design, orchestration and costuming were rich and spectacular. If you've never been to the ballet before, our National company could not fail to charm you.

Dylan Thomas

Paul Ferris

Dylan Thomas remains immensely popular among North American college students — that is, among a portion of humankind not particularly noted for its knowledge or appreciation of poetry. This may be attributable to the fact that, as his most recent biographer observes, "he lived, looked and sounded like the popular idea of a poet, with recognizably poetic poems to show for it."

Thomas appeared to be the epitome — indeed, almost a parody — of the fey, romantic Welsh bard. And the legend which blossomed and was carefully cultivated after his death nurtured and reinforced this image.

Paul Ferris, in this important new literary biography of Dylan Thomas, has skillfully sifted fact from public relations and given us a definitive account of the life of the artist and its relationship to his art. Both the outward persona — Thomas the outrageous, womanizing drunkard — and the more elusive inner reality (the hidden recesses of the creative spirit, if you will), with all its "fears and empty spaces", are illuminated and dissected.

Ferris draws upon an impressive array of sources, both oral and documentary, and possesses a vigorous, evocative and highly readable prose style which manages to convey a sense of detached sympathy for its subject that is both appropriate and credible.

He chronicles Thomas's precocious beginnings as a gifted, rebellious schoolboy in Swansea; his bohemian youth in London and stormy marriage to Caitlin — "all highlights and rock bottoms"; his period of intense creative activity during the Second World War; and the last tragic years of dissipation and disintegration, ending in his premature death under bizarre and sordid circumstances at the age of thirty-nine. As one who knew him well expressed it, "he died of being Dylan Thomas".

Ferris shows how, terror-stricken when confronted with the gradual waning of his creative powers — he only wrote six poems in the last seven years of his life — Dylan Thomas himself exacerbated the problems, connected mainly with his health and his finances, which led to his decline; how he unconsciously contrived to place himself in a position "where accidents were likely to happen".

What emerges is the portrait of a complex, tormented personality, riddled with contradiction and paradox, at once creative and destructive, callous and loving, vulgar and ineffably charming. Dylan Thomas as sotted buffoon and as dedicated, conscientious craftsman. He was a man whose "unreality was his way of life"; who, in the words of his widow, "had no strength of character, no discipline", who was "just lovely and loved by everyone" and who was finally "just eaten alive".

Mr. Ferris has produced a lucid, penetrating study, comical, pathetic and shocking by turns, which combines acute psychological insight with sound literary judgement. The life and work of Dylan Thomas have become part of the iconography of our time. Both have been well-served by this splendid biography.

Wish You Were Here

An exhibition of work since 1972 by Kingston artist, Richard Buff, opens at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre on Tuesday, 6 March and runs to 18 April 1979. It continues the Art Centre's tradition of introducing area artists to their immediate community.

The exhibition is entitled Wish You Were Here which is also the title of the main piece in the show: a multi-element environmental sculpture. The title, of course, suggests the standard postcard greeting of the having-a-wonderful-time variety. Richard Buff's work certainly encourages a feeling of getting away from it all. He has created an alien desert environment of rocks, cacti and craters made of rubber. The contradictions between the medium and the sculptural objects are intentionally playful. He has even made oversized rubber shoes for the spectators to don while walking through the landscape.

The exhibition also includes some earlier drawings by Buff, one of which, Western Genes, is part of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre's permanent collection. In lieu of a saleable catalogue (illustrated handlists will be available free of charge), Richard Buff's alias, The Snappy Tie Co. Ltd., will be offering souvenirs of the exhibition, rubber fried eggs, rubber cheques and rubber ties. (If only Dan Aykroyd would appear to perform "Rubber Biscuit").

Richard Buff will be present at the Art Centre for a Brown Bag Lunch, at 12:30pm on Wednesday, 21 March.

Ozias Leduc: The Draughtsman

An exhibition of drawings by Quebec artist Ozias Leduc (1864-1955) will open at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre on 27 February and continue until 29 March. This is a circulating exhibition prepared by the Sir George Williams Art Galleries at Concordia University, Montreal with the support of the National Museums of Canada.

Ozias Leduc is best known for his decoration of 31 churches, the earliest of which was executed in 1890 and the latest completed in 1955. This exhibition explores his draughtsmanship, both in technique and in purpose. His drawing materials included pencil, charcoal, colour washes, gouache and crayons. They show a great variety and accomplishment in methods. The work also represents the different stages through which Leduc progressed: from a simple line to the development of a theme and the subsequent transfer of the work onto squared-up sheets of paper.

For Leduc, drawing, colour and composition were "the artist's trinity." Each element was dependent on the next and together they formed a unit, but at the same time each had a specific function to perform. Of drawing he said, "Drawing essentially expresses shape... shapes alone can be depicted by drawing." Drawing then preceded the application of colour and was responsible for conveying the shapes that constitute the basis of the picture. It was at the drawing stage that essential elements, light, shadow and composition came together.

Ozias Leduc: The Draughtsman is accompanied by an extensive, illustrated catalogue which includes five critical essays on various aspects of Leduc's work.

There will be an illustrated lecture entitled Ozias Leduc: His Work in Context, by Janice Seline, a contributor to the exhibition catalogue, at the Art Centre on Tuesday, 20 March at 7:30pm.

Record Reviews

Elvis Costello and the Attractions: Armed Forces

reviewed by Jim Cormier
Elvis Costello, that quintessential 90 lb. weakling, so outraged by physical and emotional sand-kicking that he wants to reach out and throttle someone, has once again managed to channel his outrage onto a record album.

This time out, on Armed Forces, Elvis wheezes, spits and howls his way through a remarkably varied selection of angry little ditties. Throughout, the Attractions prove deserving of their name and of their first billing on an Elvis album jacket. On Armed Forces, the arrangements are more complex than on the two earlier "solo" releases and, consequently, the band really shows its stuff. Drumming runs the gamut from Indian tom-tom and restrained staccato riffs to primitive battering like hell; keyboards, likewise, range from simplistic but effective punchy organ riffs to extravagant acoustic piano flourishes; and bass guitar turns gut-shaking to heart-wrenching progressions.

Once again, Elvis Costello's songwriting approaches the bizarre. His main technique is a presentation of ugliness through cuteness: ugly thematic fare, cut-throat competition between male goons, frustratingly inaccessible and often nasty females, are presented through overly cute and gimmicky pop melodies, although rawer rock elements broil beneath the surface. This mixture is disquieting, unnerving.

The repression of anger within pop music vehicles creates a tension which builds on the album until it explodes on the final track, "What's So Funny 'Bout" Peace, Love and Understanding, written by Nick Lowe, this number affects the entire package ambiguously. It certainly provides a pseudo-Bruce Springsteen composition the most exhilarating listening experience on the album (the Attraction's uncompromisingly raw and energetic attack and Elvis' wavering werewolf vocal) and its clearly articulated pacifist theme draws out the full irony of the military titles on most of the songs.

With the exceptions of "Goon Squad" and "Accidents Will Happen", Armed Forces marks a sophistication of the Elvis Costello sound and songwriting style which, though producing many interesting and inventive sounds, robs his music of the raw simplicity which was the strength of his earlier albums. Armed Forces is a good album, but doesn't kick ass consistently enough to deserve its promotional name, "World Elvis Costello Album Three". "Emotional Facism" is truer to the album's spirit.

Tonio K.: Life in the Foodchain

Reviewed by Brent Laviolette
"That's right we're talking about life in the foodchain" and 1001 Arabian Nights it would seem. There are so many themes and conflicting viewpoints wallowing in the ambiguities of this album that it may take weeks to unravel it all. What's worse, I have a feeling that Tonio K.'s simple response to my search would be: "it's kind of like carving the turkey/kind of like mowing the lawn/everything gets to this certain dimension/winds up on a customer's plate and then gone".

At any rate, this album is not a "worthless" production by a "worthless" group as their liner notes and publishing house (Worthless Music) try to emphasize. Tonio K. is simply the greatest new rock band I've ever heard. It finally happened, punk and heavy metal, rock have met each other in the middle and the result is spectacular. This album could incite a cult movement similar to the Greatful Dead's faithful ("Dead Heads" I believe we're called).

Instrumentally the band consists of studio unknowns, but look at the production side, Rob Fraboni, the studios, Shangri la and the village Recorder, and the guest spots, Garth Hudson and Earl Slick, and you'll understand the attention they have deserved. Someone has a lot of faith in this recording, the promotion seems to be mysterious enough - ergo - this should become a "monster" as the industry calls it.

The title track and "Willie and the Pigman" suggests a perfect blend of rebellion against consumerism and social corruption. On one track Tonio K. relates a tale of John the Baptist, Atilla the Hun, Hitler and Uncle Sam living in the "material world" as it were. "American Love Affair", perhaps the best track, features a tight guitar duet overlaying a military styled snare drumming and a marching beat; "It's American underwear in the washing machine", as Tonio K. writes, "Yes, and New York may be the new world/but she's still a filthy concrete bitch/without a soul". But, then, on "Better Late Than Never" a marriage break up is related in very real and poignant terms, is highlighted by Garth Hudson's superb accordion score. On a definite punk note, "H-A-T-R-E-D" should be adopted the chant for "angry young men".

The band, Tonio K. and friends, plays aggressively. They sell their songs very well in terms of watts generated and atmosphere created. Much like Costello, the beat becomes obsessive at times. Throughout, the instrumentals are neatly packaged and powerful and the production is highly reminiscent of Richard Perry. At once it is a very serious album and a riotous partying disc; no get-together should be without a copy.

These guys must be on drugs. "But then again, with the proper counselling we could work this thing out". The department of Mental Health would never understand but all of you "punkers" should

reviewed by Brent Laviolette
Whispering Rain is a long way from that Hard Rock Town of MacLauchlan's rock "era" of two years ago. It's a definite return to some of his country roots, leaning heavily to the ballad genre.

While the second side is relatively consistent in its mediocrity and tone, the first side is irregular but far superior. "Highway One", "When You're Young (And You Don't Know Nothing)", "Nassau Town" and "Lady Luck" are among the best songs McLauchlan has ever written. Alternating the mood effectively between ballad and rock but, then, on "What Would Bogey Do?", the initial AM release, McLauchlan mystifies. I don't think this track should have been included on the album; it's trite, too reminiscent of poor "pop" music and it grates in its simple repetitiveness. However, two tracks later, "Somebody's Long Lonely Night" is definitely one of the most beautiful country waltzes ever recorded, probably the best McLauchlan has written.

Ben Mink's departure from the Silver Tractors (to FM) will have a definite effect on the live show, his violin and mandolin work is amazing on this album. David Wilcox on guitars is another welcome addition to this fine studio recording. Overall, McLauchlan's production is immaculate; he arranges and controls his musicians brilliantly, with just the right amount of flair.

Whispering Rain may not satisfy the hard-core McLauchlan fan because of its seemingly "new" direction but it should serve as an excellent introduction to the man who straddles the precarious line between country and rock with great ease.

Gold Gals OWIAA champs

Tim Turnbull

The Queen's Golden Gals capped a brilliant season with a gutsy 6-5 victory over the University of Toronto Blues to capture the Ontario Women's championship. The Gals returned the Judy McCaw trophy, emblematic of hockey supremacy, to Queen's for the fourth time in the last seven years. The finals were held at York.

The victory was a fitting climax to the Gals' season, as the team was undefeated in fourteen league and playoff games. During those contests, the Gals outscored their opponents 84-18. The difference in goal scoring reflects the Gals' strong offence and stingy defence.

The Gals cruised into the final by trouncing the Guelph Gryphonettes 10-0. U of T squeezed by York 6-3 to qualify for the championship game. Queen's had defeated Toronto 4-1 earlier in the season, but the Blues came out flying.

Center Kim Ferguson led the Gals sharpshooters with three goals. Suzanne Jackette, Janean Sergeant and Sue McGregor added single markers. Toronto was led by Murphy with two goals.

The Gals dominated play throughout the game, threatening to score at any moment. Queen's wore down the Toronto defences through sheer numbers. Coach Dave Best had organized three evenly balanced lines that could check and score. Toronto did not have the same depth of talent. The Toronto coach employed his best players as much as possible, but they could not maintain the Gals' furious pace.

Toronto struck for an early goal, but Jackette, Sergeant and Ferguson notched goals that pushed the Gals to a 3-2 first period lead. U of T scored once in the middle frame to even the score, then jumped into the lead at 0:23 of the third period.

Cheered on by a small, but vocal contingent of Queen's rooters, the Gals continued forechecking the Blues and waited for the inevitable opportunity. McGregor and Ferguson scored within thirty seconds of each other to vault Queen's back into the lead, 5-4. Ferguson's goal was a quick, screened shot that surprised the Toronto goalie.

Toronto tied the score again, then Ferguson performed a nifty exhibition of stickhandling on a rink-length rush which resulted in the winning goal. The Gals' superior conditioning wore down the Toronto players and goalie Sue Reynolds had no trouble preserving the slim lead. By the end of the game, the Blues were a well-beaten squad.

The Golden Gals deserved the victory. Playing as a cohesive team, the Gals' spirit and enthusiasm reflected a dedicated group of athletes. It was fitting that Queen's performed an Oil Thigh at centre ice after the game - the Gals were celebrating a unified effort. Coach Dave Best mentioned that he thought that the Queen's girls had more team spirit than the rest of the teams combined.

The Gals had to play their best game of the season to defeat the Blues and retain their perfect record. But the Gals proved that they were the undisputed champions of the OWIAA by dominating the opposition. They should be saluted for displaying a graceful, exciting, entertaining and winning brand of hockey.

Gaels grapplers at OUAA's

This past weekend, the Queen's wrestling team participated in the OUAA Championships at the University of Western Ontario. The team consisting of Joel Bates, Chris Thomas, John Vooys, Geoff Liddon and Brian Knox managed to amass the highest number of points that a Queen's wrestling team have captured in the past eight years of OUAA Championships.

Chris Thomas, Applied Science '79 won a bronze medal for his third place finish in the 61 Kg. weight class, the largest class at the tourney. Brian Knox also, placed third in the 100 Kg. weight class with an exciting last second pin over his opponent from York. A strong performance was turned in by Geoff Liddon who managed two wins in his four matches.

All in all, it was a good year for Queen's wrestling and with only losing one wrestler to graduation this year, we look forward to even more success next year.

Third straight OUAA title

Ski Gaels edge Western

J.M. Neilson

The Ski Gaels concluded a highly satisfactory competitive season at the commencement of Reading Week by winning their third consecutive O.U.A.A. title.

The championship meet came right down to the wire as the best of the Queen's men could do in their last three races was to finish second each time behind Western Ontario's Rob Safrata and his fellow team members. Queen's and Western finished the season in a first place tie with 39 points each out of a possible 40 for their best four out of six races but the Gaels took the title by virtue of a higher aggregate points total over the season—951 to 819 points overall. This was also the second year in a row that a tie-breaker calculation was required to determine an overall winner.

The Queen's women showed remarkable improvement in the two-day O.W.I.A.A. finals run on the same courses as the men's races at Georgian Peaks. The women won the slalom, edging Waterloo, McMaster, and Western. Nancy Esson took second place individually with Nancy Firstbrook third, Susan Patch in 14th place and Suzanne Curtis and Karen Buleychula, 21st and 22nd. The women slipped to fourth place in the giant slalom with the two Nancys reversing their 2nd and 3rd place finishes. Waterloo won the G.S. with Western and Trent 2nd and 3rd.

Over the season, Queen's came fifth in the O.W.I.A.A.; Western took the title with a possible 40 points, Waterloo was second with 35; Trent third; McMaster 4th and Queen's in fifth place.

Individual O.W.I.A.A. honours went to Andrea Esson (Ottawa) with 40 points. McMaster's Andrea Ciotti was second with 35 points; Nancy Firstbrook of Queen's took third place with 32, Nancy Esson (Queen's) and Kelly McConville (Western) tied for fourth place with 31 points each.

The final men's slalom race was won by Safrata of Western by a full second margin in a time of 96.55 seconds. Queen's Peter Flowers took third place in 98.30. Other Queen's placings were Dave Beatty 8th, Kevin Titus 11th, and Rob Grippes 16th.

Western was the team winners of the slalom with Queen's 2nd and Waterloo 3rd.

The final giant slalom was again won by Safrata in 100.21 seconds. Dave Beatty in 2nd place was only 1/100th of a second slower in 100.22. Peter Flowers captured 4th place, Kevin Titus 10th, and Bob McKinnon rounded out Queen's scoring.

Athlete of the Week

Anne Webster of the Queen's Track Team is our Athlete of the Week for her performance at the Ontario Senior Women's Championships. Anne placed 1st in the 1500 meters (4:25) and the 800 meters (2:13). This qualified her for the Canadian National Indoor Championships which were held in Edmonton, Alberta over Reading Week.

The Women's Ice Hockey team won the OWIAA Championship with a 6-5 victory over University of Toronto. Kim Ferguson paced the Gals with 3 goals in the championship game.

Another OWIAA championship was claimed by the Women's Squash

Western edged Queen's again in the team placings.

Men's individual O.U.A.A. season honours went to Rob Safrata with a possible 40 points; Dave Beatty was second with 37, and Mike Owen of the University of Toronto came third with 26 points.

The O.U.A.A. Alpine Championships won by the Gaels must be credited to their consistency over the season reflected in the team's three wins and three strong second place finishes in all six events.

Bball program back on track

Ron Jamula

Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team ended their most successful season in many years with two tough defeats over the break. The Gaels lost a high-scoring close battle to University of Ottawa Gee Gees in Ottawa then were defeated by the number one basketball team in the country, the York University Yeomen at Bartlett gymnasium. Despite these losses and an overall 2-10 record in the league play the Gaels showed signs of future stardom.

The Gaels lost three games by under eight points and in one other game were tied at the half with the strong University of Toronto Blues. As is the case with most young teams inexperience costs victory. The Gaels who have twelve of fourteen players returning next year did not have the extra poise that comes with the good teams in order to win the close games. The close defeats of this year should turn into victories next year if the development of the players continue. With Coach Tom Frood leading the rejuvenated basketball program student interest in the team is growing giving the players added incentive. With more people in the stands supporting basketball, the program has to get better.

Leaving the team this year are veteran forwards Marc Gagnon and Rick Varasva both of whom had good years. Coach Frood realized these players will be hard to replace but has confidence his returning players will be able to fill the gap.

Key players to watch in future years with the Gaels are Mike Kirby, Jamie Pitfield, and Rich Emmerson all of whom showed great potential in their rookie season. Kirby stepped right out of high school into a starting position with the Gaels. The 6'0" slick ball handling guard has the potential to be a league allstar. Other returning players include captain Phil Moore and starters Jeff Folkard and John Kutkevicious. These players entering their third year of varsity competition at Queen's, with another year of experience under them, should add the needed poise that was lacking in this year's addition of the Gaels.

Coach Frood experienced a frustrating rookie season watching his team perform outstanding at times and terrible at other times. "As much as I am satisfied with the development of the team over the year it was still very discouraging to lose. Nobody likes to lose. I know the potential is there, it's just a matter of jelling, hopefully we will start to jell next season. Our goal for next season is to make the playoffs and we definitely have a good chance."

Everything considered, this year's players and coaches of the Queen's Golden Gaels Basketball team deserve credit in turning a dying basketball program into a potential winner. Next year could be the year Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team makes their move from perennial cellar dwellers to the playoffs. It was not too long ago York University Yeomen were among the league's worst basketball teams and now they are number one in the country. That is not to say the Gaels will be number one in the country next year or in years to come, it just goes to show anything is possible in the future. Nobody likes to lose. I know the potential is there, it's just a matter of jelling, hopefully we will start to jell

Western shocks Vball Gaels

Dave Tod

On Saturday and Sunday the OUAA men's volleyball finals were held at Queen's with Western emerging as the winner over the Gaels.

Before three hundred fans in the Ross Gym on Friday evening Queen's faced last year's winner Guelph Gryphons. The Gaels dominated the best of five match using their superior blocking and spiking power to beat Guelph 15-8, 15-9, 10-15 and 15-9. The win put Queen's in the OUAA championship game the following afternoon.

The second match of the night saw Western crush the York Yeomen in three games straight. As everyone had anticipated the final saw Queen's matched against Western.

This was the third time the two clubs had faced each other. Queen's beat Western in early October to take the Brock Invitational Tournament. At Penn St. last month Western defeated Queen's in the semi-final.

As expected it was a hard fought and emotional contest but Western gained an early advantage and held on to beat the Gaels 7-15, 15-3 and 15-10. It should be noted though that this was the first time this year that Queen's was defeated in league play.

The Queen's team wishes to express their appreciation to the student body for their enthusiastic support and to coach Vaclav Smola for a job well done.

The Bews season is winding down now with play-offs already begun in several of the team sports. Hockey, Broomball, Water Polo, Bowling, Curling and Basketball began their play downs this week, with the championships in these sports to be determined next week. The tournament sports are narrowed to the last few rounds, also, with quarter final matches presently in progress.

Before reading week, the Bews Swim Meet was held in the pool. Over five hundred and fifty people competed in the three day meet. Ten records were smashed in the course of the meet. Brian Watson (Chem.) in the 50 Freestyle; Greg Vanular (Law 79) in the 100 Backstroke and 50 Backstroke; John Coke in the 50 Butterfly and Individual Medley; Al Cameron (Arts 80), in the 100 Freestyle; Jim Wiley (Arts 80) in the 100 Breaststroke and 50 Breaststroke; Blair Rydberg (Mech.) in the 200 Freestyle and finally G. Rowan, Doug Wilkie, John Coke and Don MacFayden (MBA) in the 200 Medley Relay. Arts 80 emerged the champions in the meet, with Commerce 80 and MBA finishing a close second and third respectively. Mike Borden and Todd Corradetti did an excellent job of convening the meet and many thanks go to these two for their efforts in making the meet successful.

Squash Gals flawless

Last Saturday at Trent University, the Queen's Women's squash team capped a perfect year by winning the final event in the OWIAA calendar. This 78-79 season has been the most successful ever for Queen's squash with the team winning every tournament it entered.

The OWIAA championship is based on performance in three designated tournaments throughout the year - with the Trent tournament being the last. As Queen's had won the initial two tournaments, they only needed to win one fixture in this final five team round robin. This they accomplished early Saturday morning.

With the championship under their belts, it would have been understandable if the team had relaxed to let some other team win. However, as the day wore on, Queen's got stronger and stronger and finally ended up on top. This effort meant that Queen's had won all twelve matches played this year against other universities - a remarkable performance.

To add more lustre to this effort is the fact that Queen's only fielded its top five players on one occasion. The other times, substitute players from our reserve squad were used.

Last Saturday, Queen's was missing the services of Clair Smith - arguably the second best player in the league.

Substituting for her was Cathy Johnston, who, as usual, won all her matches playing at #5. Sandra Smith capped her fine intercollegiate career by winning the #4 seed. In the years she has played intercollegiate squash, Sandra has never been beaten.

Because of the absence of Clair Smith, Natalie Sneyd and Sandra Koerner played at higher positions than they would have and although they did not win their divisions, they both played very well. Sandy is leaving Queen's this year - the squash team will miss her fine contribution. Natalie, on the other hand, is in first year and has tremendous potential. If she learns to volley and use her power, she could easily end up as the individual champion within the next couple of years.

Speaking of winning individual championships, the Queen's number one player, Jane Forbes-Roberts, did just that. This year - her final law year - Jane won every intercollegiate match she played in. So superior was she, that even prior to last Saturday she had the title sewn up. This however, did not adversely affect her play and in typical fashion she won all her matches. This was a well deserved title. Her improvement in the last three years reflects hard work, tenacity and willingness.

X-C racers end season

Derek Evans

On the first weekend of reading week the Men's and Women's Nordic Ski teams attended the Ontario University Championships held in Ottawa. Friday's events featured a mens 15 kilometer and womens 5 kilometer individual races.

In the men's 15 kilometer race Hugh Tafel, Gord Skrecky and Derek Evans all skied fine races managing to attain 3 of the top 11 positions. The women's 5 kilometer race saw Queen's racers Connie Nehr, Barb Olmsted and Chris Bowlby turn in excellent performances coming 3rd, 6th, and 7th respectively.

When the times had been tabulated on Friday, it appeared that both the men's and women's teams would have to turn in strong performances in the relays to catch the first place teams.

A well seasoned relay team from Carleton won the women's relay with Queen's #1 team placing a solid second. The Queen's women's team managed to finish second overall in the final standings, beating out teams from Guelph and the University of Toronto.

In the Men's relay the Queen's A team produced a strong 3rd place finish in a field of 17 teams. The third place finish left the Queen's team in third place overall, seconds behind 2nd place Guelph, and the champions Laurentian University.

Return to Joe Who

It is quite astounding how abruptly political fortunes have been changing of late. It was just five months ago that Joe Clark was leading the Progressive Conservatives to a thorough trashing of the Liberals in a series of by-elections in sixteen federal ridings. Political pundits were quick to mark the event as foreshadowing the demise of Pierre Trudeau; the tide of anti-Trudeau sentiment which had been growing steadily stronger had now become steadfast and immovable. It was thought that no last-ditch cure-all programs introduced by the Liberal Government would be sufficient to overcome the electorate's determination to refuse Trudeau a fourth term of office.

Today, Joe Clark has no more than an even-odds chance of becoming our next Prime Minister. The past months have brought him closely under the eye of the press and the public. Many are increasingly doubtful that Clark can inspire the leadership requisite in a troubled country during troubled times.

The ability to project an image as a strong, decisive leader, in control of whatever situation may arise, has, perhaps, been the major quality that the Canadian electorate has sought in choosing its Prime Minister. Certainly the 1974 campaign was fought, not on the basis of issues, but over who would provide the most decisive leadership.

Whether or not the upcoming election will be staged on the same battleground, it is clear that Clark's perceived leadership capabilities will be an important factor in the eventual outcome. Can he pull it off? Can Clark successfully present himself to Canada's voters as a viable alternative to an eleven-year legacy? As the past few months seem to bear out, for Joe Clark, the bubble has burst.

Voting by proxy: The next best thing to being there

The coming of this year's AMS Annual General Meeting brought with it an unpleasant and potentially abusive proxy fight among various student groups. The intent was to promote narrow organizational goals not in keeping with the purpose and traditions behind the Meeting—which should be held for the sole purpose of reporting AMS corporate by-law amendments and financial matters to the student body. Such a meeting is not unlike the annual shareholder's meetings held by any business corporation in Ontario.

Activities such as receiving the report of the AMS Board of Directors for the past budget year, the report of the AMS' auditors, and the election of new members to the Board, are the proper business of the Annual General Meeting.

Regrettably, this year's meeting purports to render decisions on a number of substantive issues lying beyond this scope. The issues are such that they belong in the agenda of Outer Council where our elected representatives can debate them, rather than in an annual meeting controlled by large blocks of proxy votes.

Proxies in themselves are an acceptable electoral tactic if limited to the election of new members to the Board of Directors. However, they should not be obtained in an attempt to "push through" motions dealing, for instance, with the rights of Faculty Societies or with securing a grant for a particular faculty house.

Furthermore, other motions dealing with specific constitutional amendments should be dealt with at Outer Council through the long-established political procedures. After all, Outer Council is a representative body, elected to govern within the boundaries established by the AMS Constitution.

It is apparent that the proxy fight and the presence of constitutional amendments on the meeting's agenda are inextricably tied. Therefore, in an effort to avoid a situation where proxy voting overrides the votes of interested students in attendance, two restrictions may be suggested.

The first would be to limit the use of proxies to specific matters, that is, to one motion at the meeting. Such a limitation would prohibit an individual from not only pursuing personal pet projects, but from holding effective voting plurality in his hands. Moreover, anyone holding proxies should be required to register them with the Secretary of the AMS incorporated before the meeting. The Secretary would then record them for the specific motion for which they were gathered.

A second, and perhaps more feasible solution, would be to remove motions concerning constitutional amendments from the meeting's agenda. This would discourage the use of proxy votes on matters other than the election of members to the Board of Directors.

The Annual General Meeting is not meant to be an alternate forum to Outer Council. Nor is it similarly a means for groups to by-pass referendums in an effort to pass particular proposals. By restricting both the types of motions that may be discussed at the Meeting, and the use of proxy votes, the Meeting will serve the function for which it was originally intended.

AGM attracts 160 for farewells and voting

Warren Everson

A record crowd defeated a motion calling for AMS support of a "liberal arts magazine" at the Annual AMS General Meeting held last Thursday.

Over one hundred and sixty people attended the meeting, which lasted from 8 o'clock until after 2 a.m.

The meeting started with a surprise decision by chairman Charlie Lund to discount several hundred proxy votes gathered by groups planning to move motions after the agenda of "housecleaning" was dealt with. Reports from the Board of Directors and selection of the next year's Board members followed.

The often tedious reports from the Commissioners was lightened by novel presentations from Hugh Dodd, who came dressed as an "Okie from Muskogee" and Lois Fallis who sang a song about Inner Council.

Next the executive described the victories and defeats of their term of office, as well as thanking those commissioners and managers who had "made the whole thing possible".

Each implored their successors to retain their sense of humour "You've got to keep your ability to laugh", said VP John Koopman "we all know the AMS is a big joke anyway".

Retiring President Dave Brown related with some amusement the haphazard way in which his team came together. "Someone suggested a name and I called. But the guy was out and I ended up talking to his roommate, John Koopman." Brown said he was taken aback again when he met Rory Cattenach, who "jogged in wearing a headband".

Once the reports were completed, the meeting turned to the sixteen motions on the agenda. While most were passed with dispatch, debate dragged on a motion that The AMS Executive-elect become voting members of Outer Council in March, even though their term will begin at the end of April. Though protests from Outer Council members about the change in the Council's makeup made the issue a hot one, it too eventually passed.

It was on the issues of a grant for the Commerce House and AMS support of a liberal arts magazine that debate broke out. Deprived of their large number of proxy votes, the Commerce House organizers faced a tough debate against opposition from Dave Brown, and a variety of other people. However, pledging the house's open door policy would be strictly observed, the Commerce students eventually won the vote.

Debate on Sweden was even more protracted and intense. Mover David Owen introduced the motion with the argument that Queen's needed a forum for the Arts. However, critics pointed out that Owen had no clear financial plan for the magazine, and that the editors had not even been chosen.

Hugh Dodd demanded to know if there was to be "obscene materials" in the magazine, a question which led to his attempt to define obscenity. Supporters of the project made a spirited defense, mocking rumours that have grown over the proposed forum. But their wit was largely lost on a skeptical crowd, who eventually defeated the proposal.

Commerce gets grant

Happy housemakers

Janet Brick
The Commerce House Committee was granted $1250.00 at the AMS Annual General Meeting Thursday night. The money will come out of the AMS capital fund and will be used to furnish a board room in the house.

There was considerable debate over the issue of financial support and the AMS Executive was divided in its views. John Koopman, Vice-President, (Operations) said, "I think it's about time we threw our support behind this." He felt that as the House had A.M.S. approval and was going ahead anyway, it should receive funds to make it a project students can be proud of.

Dave Brown, President of the A.M.S., objected to granting money at a time when the AMS is trying to increase its capital account. He suggested an interest-free loan would be more appropriate. Dave Court, President of the Commerce Society, responded by pointing out that the $1250 requested was a small fraction of the current $100,000 capital fund. He insists that it is a one time donation of approximately ten cents per student. Commerce students are paying $10 per year, every year, in their student interest fees.

Former student Dave Gorden believed granting money to Commerce was discriminatory, as other faculty projects had not received financial support of the A.M.S. He cited Clark Hall Pub and the Graduate House as examples. The organizers countered this by making the distinction that Clark Hall could generate revenues but the Commerce House won't be doing so. As for the Grad House, its services are not available to all students, while the Commerce House will have an open door policy.

Arts student Eric Evans raised doubts about the effectiveness of the open-door policy. He felt that students of other faculties will not make use of the services and facilities provided by the Commerce House. Members of the House Committee acknowledged that such a psychological barrier may exist, but emphasized that measures are being taken to eliminate it. For example, they intend to give it a name with no Commerce connotations, and will take Orientation groups through the House to familiarize them with its services.

The grant brings the total sum to be spent on the House to $20,000. In an effort to make the House a "showcase", they have put almost all their money towards it. Dave Court said the commerce capital fund was reduced to "about $1000."

Students seeking aid flood Counselling Service

Rick Emmerson

There is a one week waiting list for students seeking appointments for study skills training, career or personal counselling according to Dr. Trevor Smith of the Queen's Student Counselling Service.

Dr. Smith explained that "although the service has recently undergone a great deal of expansion, there is still an excess demand for counselling, as the staff continues to work on a part-time basis."

Of the projected 1000 individuals who take advantage of the facilities at 32 Queen's Crescent, approximately half seek study skills training. The centre provides assertiveness and relaxation training, reading development skills and examination anxiety reduction training.

Of the remaining 500 staff and students who visit the centre, half seek some sort of personal counselling. The most prevalent problems involve anxiety and depression, although the centre has intermittently had to deal with cases of potential suicide.

The investigation shows that the staff of psychologists and social workers, who are largely of the behaviorist school of psychology, have been effective in dealing with many such problems. Individuals who require more extensive counselling are referred to the psychiatric staff at Health Services.

The consensus among both the staff of the Queen's Counselling Service, and the Kingston General Hospital, is that the volume of patients and the nature of their demands remain constant from year to year.

Telephone Aid of Kingston (TAK), which is a listening referral and information service operating between 7pm and 7am, also reports no significant changes, from one season to another.

However, Doug King, Director of TAK, told the Journal that as final exams approach, a greater percentage of calls involve academic related anxiety and depression. Of the approximately 650 callers last semester, 8 were classified as suicidal. Statistics are not yet available for this semester.

The Grey House and its staff act as the co-ordinating body for all student services. All professional counselling is entirely confidential and without charge.

will be enforced on any staff members who fail to attend the Journal Party Friday, March 9 at 8 Aberdeen.

Corporations show generous support

Pledges made good

[Staff] - Representatives from Bell Canada and Northern Telecom presented Principal Ronald L. Watts with cheques for $20,000 last week, representing the first installments of the companies' $100,000 pledges to Queen's Quest.

The Quest was set up last year with a target of raising $10 million for the university over the next five years. To date, volunteers have succeeded in collecting $3.3 million in cash, and a total of $8.9 million in pledges.

However, according to Vice-Principal (Development and Information) James M. Courtright, manager of the Quest, "It will take as much work to raise the final $11 million worth of pledges as it did to raise the first $8.9 million, as we have already used up most of our friends and closest contacts."

Corporations have pledged $5,699,000 to the cause, with the remaining $3,243,000 coming from alumni, faculty and staff, students and parents.

The funds will be used for improvements to six major areas of students' services: library services, scientific and technical equipment, renewal of facilities, academic development, research support, and student aid.

Grievance Board needs
students for summer staff

[Special] - The Grievance Board is a Senate Committee with jurisdiction to deal with grievances respecting decisions made by the University or its constituent parts, brought by students, faculty members or employees holding a letter of appointment from the Principal. Matters involving tenure, decisions with respect to salary or promotion, and academic decisions however, do not fall within the ambit of the Grievance Board.

The Grievance Board is composed of one faculty Senator, one student Senator, and the Chairman. A problem has arisen with regard to staffing the Grievance Board in the summer, when the majority of student Senators are away from Kingston. Therefore, the Nominating Committee is now requesting applications from any students who would be interested in serving on the Grievance Board, and who would be available during the summer months.

Application forms are available in the Senate Office, Room 225 Richardson Hall, and should be completed by Friday, March 9, 1979.

The Whig Standard turns to computers

Oldest paper-newest machines

Joanne Langley

Technological change has swept through Canada's oldest continuous daily newspaper increasing efficiency, saving money, and rendering obsolete 19 veteran typesetting workers.

The Kingston Whig-Standard, founded in 1843, joined newspapers across North America earlier this year when it made the transition from a manual production system to a $1 million Harris 1134 computer system. Last week production manager G

Mohns took four Journal reporters for a tour of the new system.

The key to the Harris system is the VDT—video display terminal—which is directly linked to a central computer. Copy from the newsroom, wire services, and advertising departments is typed onto the 28 television-like machines, thus eliminating typewriters, pencils, and paper. The information is then transmitted electronically to phototypesetting equipment and automatically printed on to photographic paper. The actual printing process remains the same: the finished page is photographed and transferred to an engraved plastic plate which is fitted onto the printing press.

Before the installation of the computerized method reporters typed their stories on paper and sent it to the composing room. The copy was then retyped on to paper tape, and "read" by the phototypesetting machines. Mr. Mohns added that "on a good day" a composing room employee might type seven lines a minute; the Harris computer, which omits the retyping stage, fires out 1,000 lines a minute.

By this spring the Whig will have 32 terminals in operation. At present 18 VDT's are in the newsroom, three in the classified advertising department and two in display advertising.

To "enter" the computer network each authorized employee is given a special password. Once the story is on the screen (in luminous green), various keys and buttons allow error correction, the insertion or deletion of text, or the removing of paragraphs.

The new system is not without its flaws, some human-induced. Some reporters complain of "terminal anxiety", perhaps the natural result consequence of adapting to advanced machinery. In some systems, with the inadvertent press of the wrong button, a story can vanish from the screen, and may even reappear at another newspaper. As well, errors previously caught by the linotype operator or proof reader now appear in the paper.

The Whig's investment, purchased from the Harris corporation in Melbourne, Florida, should pay for itself within two years. The financial saving results from the reduction by attrition and layoffs, of composing room labor.

Several North American companies produce equipment for computerized newsgathering, among them the linofilm process used by the Globe and Mail. The Harris system is used by the New York Times, the Edmonton Journal, and the Ottawa Citizen. Almost all major newspapers are converting to similar systems.

As for the workers who "paid the price of progress", the 19 composing room employees, some are bitter while others have taken the layoff "in stride." The Kingston Typographical Union set up quite a successful relocation committee with the newspaper, and negotiated a severance agreement.

One employee summed up the group's sentiments last fall.

"I was disappointed with the layoff, but if you accept change as good, everything has been a step forward in the printing trade."

"I had hoped the cards would play to allow me to finish out my work life here in Kingston, but I was not dealt that kind of hand. I accept it."

Old typesetter; 7 lines a minute on a good day.

The new VDT's are the heart of the system. Efficient and fast, they make the flow of copy to the massive presses [below] remarkably smooth.

The World in Brief...

Sandi Arthurs

Regina - Regina's main downtown branch of the Royal Bank of Canada entertained its customers with a "Bill Sale" last Thursday. Dollar bills were sold for $97, $5 bills for $4.89 and $10 bills for $9.89. The branch was closed last Wednesday due to a fire in the next building so the little special was held as an apology.

Ottawa - The Thompson Publishing Interests made a $365.2 million offer for the takeover of the Hudson's Bay Co. Prime Minister Trudeau stated the sheer size of the offer warrants a review under the Combines Investigation Act. Hudson's Bay Co. presently controls both Simpsons and Zeller's Ltd. - the takeover would give Thompson control of 35-60 per cent of all retail sales by department stores in Canada.

Dryden - A 16 year old boy suffered extensive eye damage after viewing Monday's Solar Eclipse without any eye protection. The optometrist caring for the boy said his vision might improve slightly with time but presently he only has 10 per cent clear vision.

Philippines - A 17 year old girl was the only survivor of a group of 50, discovered 20 weeks after their fishing boat ran aground on a reef off the Southern Philippines. Refugee Tran Hue Hue lived on seagulls, oysters and rainwater. The 50 were fleeing Viet Nam aboard a 36 ft. fishing boat.

Ottawa - The federal government hopes a new bill redefining prostitution convictions will have a speedy passage through the House of Commons. The bill establishes that a prostitute need not offer his/her services in a pressing or persistent manner in order to be convicted of soliciting in a public place. It is simple words or gestures will be considered sufficient.

Police in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto have pushed for such Criminal Code amendments for a long time as the public nuisance of prostitutes is rapidly growing in downtown streets.

Rhodesia - Prime Minister Ian Smith gravely announced the end of minority rule after 88 years as he closed the last session of the white-dominated House of Assembly. A black majority government will be elected April 20.

Canada - The experts have misjudged the predicted rate for women's participation in the work force - the women's participation rate was 46 per cent of the working age population in 1976, was expected to rise to 48.9 per cent in 1986 and it was recorded as 48.8 per cent in January 1979! Unfortunately for Canadian Folk, there is a good chance that high employment will persist throughout the next decade.

Iran - Iran resumed oil exports as of last Monday, selling directly to the highest bidder. The exports will be only one eighth of their previous levels; about 1.5 million barrels a day, 800,000 of which will be set aside for domestic use - it's bicycle time in AMERICA!

Canada - Air Canada is offering discounts from 48 to 68 percent of regular economy rates for an experimental period from March 27 to May 7. The fares require 7 days advance booking with a minimum stay of 7 days and maximum of 30 days. CP Air - Vancouver has presently launched a protest with Transport Minister Otto Lang against what they consider to be destructive fare reductions.

AMS Board irks councillors

John Koopman

Controversy erupted at the March 1st AMS Annual General Meeting when President Binhammer broke with tradition in announcing his previously undisclosed slate for the A.M.S. Board of Directors. The new slate left open only two positions for Outer Council appointees. Traditionally Council has been allocated three representatives.

A.S.U.S. President Ross Bartlett a 1978-79 member of the Board, led the battle against the motion citing "the dichotomy in A.M.S. government that demands communication between the Board and Outer Council."

The executive elect eventually prevailed as the proposed slate was elected in toto. Sheila Murray, Paul Steep and Sandy Reid were elected members at large to what appears to be a very strong Board. Richard Binhammer, Jeff Beck, Professor Nick Bala (Law), and Professor Jim Ellert (Business) will round out the 1979-1980 Board.

Wimps joust with Journal

Eric Evans

Golden Words once again faces the agony of defeat next week when they challenge the mighty Journal Juggernauts over a hot hockey puck at Jock Hart Arena. The Third Annual Queen's Journal - Golden Words hockey game will be held at 9:30 PM on Saturday March 17 and all are welcome to come and see the inadequacies of the GW staff.

Golden Words has never won a Journal-GW hockey game, but they keep coming back for more. This year's GW team, if their paper is any indication, will be weak once again. Graeme Bates, GW co-editor, has been taking figure skating all term in preparation for the game, but it's not likely that this will help him against the powerful Journal team.

The Juggernauts have a long lineup of superstars, with talented pros like Boom Boom Bakis, Tripper Timmy Greenwood, and Beth "the ripper" Mackenzie. With Martha "Disco Hips" Bell coming out of retirement, and new Journal Editor Drew Fagan ready to do battle with "Beaver" in the corners, GW is in serious trouble. While the Journal will have the handicap of its old editor, Chrissy Hall, it is hoped that they will be able to keep him benched.

John Koopman, recently deposed Vice-President of the AMS, will be one of the referees. GW hopes that all the nasty comments made in the Journal this year about Koopman will work in their favour. Obviously they do not realize that John Koopman is the newest addition to the Journal news staff.

Marxism at turnstiles

Dave Duff

The present debate over the increase in Toronto's public transit fares could be aided tremendously by a careful study of the actions of a somewhat smaller, but no less significant government - none other than our own Alma Mater Society. Through its spectacular "Bus-It" program of socialized transportation, Queen's University has demonstrated to the entire world that the only acceptable method of public transportation is complete subsidization through government taxation.

Engaging in a little Cartesian speculative reasoning, it becomes clear that such a program is the cure to all the ills of the Toronto Transit Commission. Its benefits even extend beyond the sphere of transportation.

The first outcome of a T.T.C. "Bus-It" scheme is that everyone except the wealthy bourgeoisie elites of Bay Street would flock to the bus stops. The elimination of fares would increase demand and long lines would develop as people waited for the few buses and subways available. Once inside the bus or subway, riders would be uncomfortable. After a few days of this, the public would demand better service. The T.T.C. would be forced to provide more comfortable seats, buy more buses, build more subway lines and hire more employees. The initial benefit, therefore, would be a boost to the sagging economy as the unemployed traded in their meagre garments for those magnificent tanned safari suits. The ranks of the urban proletariat would swell.

Naturally, the government would have to increase taxes significantly. Initially, the burden would be borne by the working classes, but as their number increased with the hiring of more T.T.C. employees, they would no longer put up with the gross inequality of bourgeois society. The government would be forced to give in to their demands. The capitalists would have to pay an increasingly high proportion of taxes. Legislation would be enacted to prevent the bourgeoisie from driving their Cadillacs downtown. Tariffs would increase the price of automobiles. Eventually, the bourgeoisie would be eliminated.

Since cars would be excessively expensive and no longer necessary under this socialist society, automobiles would gradually become extinct. The atmosphere would be much cleaner. Furthermore, due to the fall in oil and automobile imports, Canada's balance of payments would improve remarkably. This, in turn, would strengthen the Canadian dollar. Finally, there would no longer be a need for parking lots; this extra downtown space would put an end to urban sprawl - head offices of corporations that have moved from Montreal to Toronto could be built on this land.

End to ignorance or thirsty Thursday

The Editor

I attended for the first time last Thursday night the A.M.S. annual general meeting. Realizing I'd passed up an entertaining night at the Pub I thought that most people have a lot better things to do on a Thursday night than to actually get an insight into the workings that affect our lives at Queen's. But as I sat there that common feeling of apathy or ignorance left me.

I became intrigued at the complexities and depth of the problems being posed and of the lack of student representation. To debate the motions, the same influential few voiced what were well considered arguments and very different viewpoints.

The point I'm alluding to is that the large majority of people at our school care little about the making of decisions by student officials, but when affected by resulting policies, they criticize and complain to no end.

This stuff tastes like it was filtered through old gym socks.

A case in point, one which will undoubtedly stir negative reactions follows. To summarize, a motion proposed by Ian Rutherford, Chairman of the Commerce House Committee, and his confederates, moved that the A.M.S. grant the committee a lump-sum of $1250 (about 10c a person) to complete the furnishing of the house, which had been delayed because of the fact that the committee's funds had run dry even though they had full financial support from Commerce students.

Amusingly, about 15 minutes prior to the reading of the motion, a herd of engineering students filled the room, with the expected intent to vote down the motion.

A heated debate took place over whether the house, to be run by Commerce students, and open to all students, which had received A.M.S. policy support, deserved 10c from each student. The arguments for both sides were presented thoroughly and in depth, at times by passing the present motion and delving into what appeared to be faculty warfare. In the end, the motion was passed, and to the surprise of myself and I'd suspect others in the room, supported to a certain extent by some of the engineers who had entered the room earlier.

So you ask what my point is. The facts were presented clearly and at the time of the vote everyone in the room had a clear and unbiased understanding of what was being asked of them. People did not necessarily vote in the manner expected of them when they entered the room, but they did vote with a clear and total understanding of the motion.

My point is not to congratulate the success of the motion, or to disapprove of it, but to say, that before taking a stand on topics such as this, one's ignorance must be overcome and a full understanding of the facts met.

Leafs' Neilson ratings

Colin Brown

I want to tell you about the Leafs.

In our society of Montreal Canadian worshippers, those bubbly individuals whose greatest emotional strain related to hockey resembles a scarcely suppressed yawn, no doubt it would be more proper to talk about the team which is certainly one of the best to ever take the ice. But for reasons of my own emotional involvement with hockey, and also in the hope of explaining to the outside world just why Toronto fans have such masochistic tendencies in any sport, I've got to tell you about the Leafs.

You see, I grew up with them. No in a physical sense naturally, but spiritually The Toronto Maple Leafs were like The Beatles or any other institution a few years ago which had the ability to capture the imagination of young people. Whenever I see them play, I think of my first trip to Maple Leaf Gardens, the electrifying sound of a huge crowd roaring after a goal is scored and just being there on a Saturday night and seeing these people alive and real, not on a television screen. Keon, Pulford, Armstrong and Pronovost. 1967 and the Stanley Cup. Names and dates echoing from a dreamlike past.

Some of the old emotions returned this weekend, as we awaited the verdict in the Roger Neilson affair. The incident had all the elements of powerful drama: an evil owner turfs out a young and dedicated coach. The players insisted on taking the blame for the club's dismal record. Phone calls and telegrams pour in, many suggesting that it is the owner and not the coach who should be axed. The players demand their coach back. The evil owner backs down, rehires the coach and lamely passes the whole incident off as "a hoax", a remark everyone knows is a lie. The coach appears behind the bench that night and 16,000 people rise in thunderous applause as the coach sheds a tear, smiles weakly and proceeds to coach his team to a victory over the Philadelphia Flyers. It was emotional drama of the highest order, the type of incident which reveals what a personal involvement people feel with their teams, coaches and players.

Now, this doesn't mean that the team is any better. One thing about being a Leaf fan is that you learn to be a realist in a great hurry, otherwise you don't last very long. Leaf fans live dangerously, and we never know where our next meal is coming from.

Life is a series of mediocre "ups" and devastating "downs." The "downs" are the worst. We tend to lose money, grumble a lot and talk long into the night about a team which seems beyond hope.

But we wouldn't want it any other way. One "up", like the look on Roger Neilson's face Saturday night, cancels out a year of downs. It's all great fun and we'll never learn. I guess it's just something which Montreal fans can't understand.

Raisin Weekend teaches Latin and vine plundering

Kathy McDermott

Queen's University Exchange Student St. Andrews is not able to boast a Irish week comparable to that at Queen's. However the "show and tell" of initiation is wound into one weekend in November - Raisin Weekend - the famous of the St. Andrews traditions. Every first year student (bejant and bejantine) will acquire during the first few weeks, a senior man and senior woman (referred to as academic father and mother - more commonly known as "dad" and "mom"). The duties of this alma pater/mater are (as the Latin suggests) mainly of a fostering nature, a general dogsbody from whom to get all information required, such as, where not to wear your gown, whom to approach in time of difficulty and how to find books in the St. Andrews library (and that is a difficult puzzle, as far as I am concerned). Traditionally, in return for this service the ever-grateful bejant(ine) gives each parent a pound of raisins and receives a ribald receipt in Latin. Of course, nowadays, a pound of raisins would probably bring a smart cuff about the ears, and a more modern presentation is a bottle of wine.

A particular Monday in the Martinmas term is designated as "Raisin Monday". The custom is that, during the morning of that day, the bejant(ines) must carry their receipts for inspection by the senior students. Any flaw detected in the Latin (and there are usually plenty if the parents cannot write in that language) and the bearer is required to sing the "Gaudeamus" (university song). Failure to comply with this demand can be disastrous; one may end up looking like cake batter (flour and eggs seem to appear from nowhere). On the whole, most students are quite happy to sing and impromptu quartets are heard in tea-houses, lecture rooms or on street corners. One aspect of "Raisin Monday" that has changed over the years is the form of the receipt. (There is a catch to everything that is fun.) The receipt used to be on parchment, but now there is a different interpretation. Nowhere is it specified on what it has to be written and consequently it may be as bizarre, bulky or perverse as the parent desires. Students appear with receipts written on lavatory seats, bathtubs, car doors, window frames, balloons, garbage cans, chairs, T.V. screens, in short, anything.

The tradition is very ancient and dates back to the time of a Bishop Wardlaw, who when sitting in his study one day, was aroused by the crashing of branches in his garden. On peering out of his window, he saw three figures in gowns, plundering his vines. He at once asked what they were doing and they, to ingratiate themselves no doubt, said that his sermon had so moved them that they were taking the grapes to the aged and sick. He wished to communicate them on the spot but he could not find a suitable curse in his breviary, on account of misplacing his spectacles. Instead, he said that every year, the bejants and their successors, should bring to him, Bishop of St. Andrews, a pound of grapes, or failing this, a pound of raisins. As long as he lived the bejants brought the enforced offering, and upon his death, the magistrates (students in the senior year) claimed the privilege.

As you can see, today, more lustre has been added to the custom. For the remainder of the year, the bejant(ines) have a "guide, philosopher and friend", and these friendships usually last for life.

Wine and line-ups;
food for thought

The Editor,

Friday night marked the climactic turning point for several hundred Queen's students as third and fourth year Arts students gathered at the Austrian Club to celebrate our forthcoming graduation. Unfortunately, for those of us anticipating an evening of festivities, the Arts and Science Formal was somewhat of a disappointment.

The meal itself was largely to blame. The queues around the tables made obtaining one's dinner a lengthy process. We were forced to eat in shifts, as inevitably several of our tablemates were lost in the crowds.

Table settings included plastic wine glasses which remained unfilled during the course of the meal. Finally, it was announced that wine glasses would be filled at the bar - seemingly only the privileged few received service at their table. Another line up endured was "rewarded" with one glass of Niagara's finest and cheapest - even the white wine was warm. Toasting was more of an endurance test, although once the taste buds were destroyed the wine went down more easily.

One wonders why the meal was so brief. Tables were cleared immediately and leftover food rapidly vanished. The meal was too rushed and enjoyment was hampered by the pace at which we were pressured to gulp our food. The meal was barely touched when dessert was announced.

The dinner stands in stark contrast to last year's Graduation Formal when roast beef and all the trimmings were featured. The graduates of 1978 were treated to an excellent meal complete with a flowing supply of imported red and white wine poured into monogrammed wine glasses which were given to each guest as a memento of the occasion.

Recognizing that food prices have escalated within the last year, we are perhaps victims of the times. However, at the price of the tickets one expects more. Guests would probably have been willing to absorb the incremental cost of good wine and better service. Fortunately, the evening was not completely marred. The music was excellent, the dancing superb and a good time was had by all in spite of the dinner.

10 Opinion

Tightening the screws

Paul Tinari

Last week the oil minister for the new administration of Iran made an unprecedented move in announcing that from now on Iran will sell its oil on the open market to the highest bidder. In doing this, Iran was in fact overruling the decision made at the last OPEC meeting, where it was decided that the international price of crude oil would increase only moderately.

As can be expected, many of the other OPEC nations have responded by raising their own oil prices. What this means to the industrial nations of the Western world is that there is no longer any limit to the international price of oil. In simple terms, the sky is the limit.

It is very probably that in the future, this event shall mark the beginning of the end of the fossil fuel era in the Western world. An important chain of events has already begun. For instance, in Canada we will be paying in the order of two million dollars more per day for our imported oil. At the same time,

Alberta has hinted that it will be raising the prices on its crude to be more compatible with the international price. There can be only one result to Canadian consumers, higher prices for all types of hydrocarbons.

Things are expected to become serious in the United States in the immediate future. The whole of the proven reserves of Alaska are expected to provide only two years supply to the U.S. at the very most and alternate energy systems are at present in no condition to be deployed to fill the ever-increasing gap which will form between supply and demand. The Carter administration has made it clear that it will have no hesitation in introducing compulsory gas rationing throughout the United States. Many energy experts are predicting that this will only be the beginning and in the long run all of North America can be expected to suffer severe withdrawal symptoms from oil supply reductions unless drastic steps are implemented.

As expected the general North American population is not in the least bit upset or alarmed about the developments of the last few days. After all, the general opinion is that we've pulled through the energy crisis of 1973 without to many problems, so this new challenge should not prove any more difficult. But it should be pointed out that this crisis is more serious and more extensive than the one of 1973. The Western economies are already having great difficulties in meeting their balance of payments, and a further increase in the price of imported oil will certainly make matters much worse. Many Americans are expecting Mexican oil to help fill the gap, but this hope can be considered sheer fantasy. Sooner or later we will all have to read the writing on the wall; we will have to make the drastic change from a society highly dependent of fossil fuels, to one which has developed alternate forms of energy on a massive scale. This transition could prove most difficult if the attitudes of the general public do not start changing. The time has come to stop dreaming of days gone by when energy was cheap and plentiful and to wake up to the harsh realities of life, and energy, or our future lifestyle will suffer if we do not.

The time has come for a frank and open discussion of sexual harassment. During the last decade or so society as a whole has become much more aware of, and sensitized to the issue of rape and sexual assault. Only recently though, has sexual harassment been recognised as the serious problem that it is.

It is currently being viewed by many as "mini-rape". This is not to suggest that it is any less serious than rape, only that the two are closely related. Coercion and power, the element that distinguishes rape from a mutually desired sexual experience, also separate sexual harassment from friendly in-lewd remarks, jeering, obscene phone calls and being followed are all forms of intimidation.

For further clarification, consider the following examples.

A university student in Toronto was called for a date by her professor. When she declined he said, "I've got your paper right here. Want to change your mind?"

terchange between two consenting equals

As more and more people realize that sexual harassment is not merely a personal dilemma, or a disturbing fact of life to be accepted with resignation, they gain the courage to speak out about the problem and tackle it constructively. This is especially true of sexual harassment in the workplace, the area that has received the most attention to date.

One writer has called it, "women's most dangerous occupational hazard". Two recent books on this subject are Sexual Shakedown by Lin Farley, and more pertinent to the Canadian situation, Leah's Cohen's The Secret Oppression: Sexual Harassment of Working Women.

In the U.S. organizations such as the Alliance Against Sexual Coercion have been formed to offer legal and personal counselling services to the many victims of sexual harassment on the job. However, the problem also exists in academic settings. The same factors that operate in the workplace are also present within the university community.

What is sexual harassment?
The term covers a very broad range, from such seemingly innocent incidents as being pinched or fondled, to being forced into sexual intimacies through outright threats. The common feature in all cases is that the victim is not a willing participant; she does not give her consent freely.

Although harassment can occur between equals (i.e. classmates or workmates) an element of power is frequently involved. Employers, professors, and so on may abuse their position of control over the destiny of others. Harassment need not be physical either. Prolonged staring,

A secretary was made to listen to daily accounts of her bosses sexual exploits

A student who was feeling ill went to speak with her instructor. Noticing her pallor, he said "Chick, what you need is a hot, deep protein infusion!"

A waitress was constantly subjected to customers pinching her buttocks and reaching their hands under the short skirt she was required to wear. When she complained to the manager, he told her that this was part of the job and it meant good business for the restaurant; if she didn't like it, she could quit.

Enough? It is easy to see why victims do not often complain. Fear of ridicule, reprisal or retaliation are potent discouraging factors. In an economic recession, with employment opportunities few and far between, it becomes even more dangerous to rock the boat and threaten your job or academic career. Also, victims may experience guilt and embarrassment. They often feel, no matter how unreasonably, as if somehow they were to blame. The attitudes and lack of understanding on the part of the general public are largely responsible for this. As with rape, the victim is often held responsible for the behaviour of the offender.

"...she must have done something to deserve it...you know, walked or dressed sexily, what else do you expect of a healthy male?"

As well as the threat to career, the anxiety and emotional trauma that usually accompany sexual harassment take a heavy toll, possibly causing nervous exhaustion and other physical and psychological disorders.

Is sexual harassment a problem at Queen's?

That itself is half the problem - we don't know. Due to the sensitive nature of the issue, it is not discussed openly. However, cases of sexual assault and sexual harassment have recently been brought to the attention of the Principal's Advisory Review Committee on the Status of Women at Queen's.

These may be isolated incidents or they may be the proverbial tip of the iceberg. Either way, one case is enough to warrant the existence of effective procedures to deal with the problem. The Committee is now in the process of examining and evaluating the situation and current methods of handling it.

Specifically, what is Queen's doing about sexual harassment?

In a recent interview, Merrilees Muir, Director of Student Affairs explained, "On the recommendation

a general awareness of the issue. This group is composed of representatives of Student Services, the principal's Advisory Review Committee, the Queen's Women's Centre and the A.M.S.

As part of the campaign an electronic recording device has been installed to receive calls. We want to assure people that names need not be divulged and strict confidentiality is guaranteed. We encourage individuals to take advantage of this opportunity to volunteer information about experiences or feelings that may be difficult to express in person. (See accompanying box).

However, if anyone should want more personal contact, she or he is invited to call, write or visit the Student Affairs Centre (the Grey House) and ask for either Merrilees of the Principal's Advisory Review Committee, a working group was formed to determine the extent of harassment and assault within the university community and to promote or Sheila. This campaign is expected to continue till the end of the winter term."

What recourse do victims have?
It is fairly obvious what should be done in cases of rape and sexual assault. Kingston is fortunate to have a Rape Crisis Centre that operates a 24-hour crisis line (544-6424). In such cases, legal aid may be sought and charges laid under the Criminal Code. The police force can also be useful in dealing with obscene phone calls, exhibitionism, peeping toms and so on.

Sexual Harassment

federally funded educational institution constitutes a form of sexual discrimination in education. He held that failure to act against sexual harassment was tantamount to condoning it.

Canadian students are particularly vulnerable in that they don't have access to either class-action suits or the Human Rights

More women are refused employment, fired, or forced to quit salaried jobs as the result of sexual demands and the ramifications thereof than from any other single cause.

Betty Harrigan, author of Games Mother Never Taught You

Some ways of specifically dealing with sexual harassment, depending on the form it takes, are civil suits for defamation of character, and taking action through unions or professional organizations. Discussing and sharing experiences with others is often a crucial first step in creating the sense of solidarity which encourages the initiation of complaints. An example of the effect of such solidarity is the case of the one hundred workers in Campbell River B.C. who shut down a saw-mill to force the dismissal of the supervisor who tried to force sexual favours from female employees.

Other, formal channels of complaint are the provincial Human Rights Commissions, although each province may handle it differently. Ontario has accepted complaints under Section 4 (sexual discrimination in employment) and settled them informally; as of yet, none have proceeded to the formal hearing stage. It is important to note that no legislation has been passed covering sexual harassment in particular.

Unlike Canada, class-action suits may be filed in the U.S. In 1977, a group of female students and a male professor took advantage of this to charge Yale University with failure to institute mechanisms and procedures to address complaints of sexual harassment, thus denying equal opportunity in education.

The magistrate ruled that the trial should proceed on the grounds that a case of sexual harassment at a Code. Therefore, adequate recourse must be made available within the university. Other Canadian universities are currently investigating this problem. Although some have Ombudsmen who may deal with such complaints and others may settle problems informally through such offices as the Dean of Women, as far as we know, none have instituted modes of redress specifically against sexual harassment.

At the present time, at Queen's, the Grievance procedure is the only formal channel of complaint. The student is first required to approach the professor in question in an effort to resolve the problem. If this is not successful or appropriate, the student may then go to the department head or on to the Dean to request that some action be taken.

If the student feels that justice has not been done, she or he may then grieve the action taken, or lack of it, to the Grievance Board. So, in other words, the student would not be grieving the harassment per se but rather the Dean's decision about the initial complaint. Whether or not this procedure is appropriate to handle cases of sexual harassment is a question that has yet to be fully answered.

Anyone wishing more information on any aspect of this issue should contact the Student Affairs Centre.

To lift the veil of silence that surrounds sexual harassment requires a concerted effort by all to understand the problem and to create an atmosphere conducive to free and open discussion. Remember, the key is "DON'T KEEP IT TO YOURSELF".

Don't keep it to yourself

(Please call 547-2988) If you have experienced any kind of sexual harassment or sexual assault DON'T KEEP IT TO YOURSELF.

An electronic recording device has been set up to help determine the extent of harassment on campus. The line will be operating on a 24-hour basis from March 1 on. You will not have to give any names and your experience will be held in confidence. If you prefer more personal communication, drop into the Student Affairs Centre (the Grey House) at 51 Queen's Crescent or call 547-6995 and ask for Merrilees or Sheila. You may also write to the above address.

You may use the following questions as a guide:

- Are you a student, staff member, administrator, faculty member?
- Male or female? Age?
- How long ago did the incident take place? Where did it happen?
- Briefly describe what happened. Please specify whether the incident involved verbal harassment, physical harassment, propositions or threats, assault or attempted assault, obscene phone calls etc.
- Do you know the offender? (If possible, specify how)

- Were there any aftereffects of the incident, whether physical, emotional or academic?

- Did you seek help or initiate any action through:

- Student Counselling Service
- Student Affairs Centre
- Student Health Service
- Campus Security
- Police
- Legal Aid
- Queen's Women's Centre
- Office of the Dean of Women
- Residence officials
- University administrators or boards members of the clergy, friends, any other?

- Did you receive any assistance? If so, what kind? Was it satisfactory?

- If you didn't seek assistance, why not?

- Do you feel that anything could have been done by the University or anyone else to prevent this incident from occurring or to have helped you afterward?

- In general, do you feel safe on campus?

- Do you have any general comments about the issue of sexual assault and sexual harassment?

Women are beginning, however slowly and cautiously, to talk about their experiences, despite their fear of reprisal. They've been wanting to tell someone, and this sharing of sexual molestation or exploitation will be the single most important weapon for combatting the problem.

Dan Hill

Jim Cormier

On Saturday night, Dan Hill wooed a Grant Hall capacity crowd, plucking heart strings more skillfully than guitar strings.

Hill worked relentlessly at breaking down entertainer/audience barriers through witty and often self-deprecating anecdotes. By referring to obvious differences between he and Gino Vanelli, by attributing his own recent international success to "coincidence", and by revealing that he still has illusions concerning "real" stars like Art Garfunkel, Hill established himself as a professional nice guy as well as a professional entertainer.

Perhaps Dan Hill is entertaining precisely because he is such an unlikely entertainer. In physical presence, he is no John Travolta. Seated, he chops away at his guitar and stomps a pigeon-toed stockinged foot; standing, he awkwardly plunges his hands in and out of his pockets, writhing about in what seems a subtle version of the John Belushi impersonation of Joe Cocker. Throughout, though, he flashes boyish beaver-like grins, and all of his awkwardness is forgiven by fluttering motherly female hearts.

There were many elements of true professionalism in Saturday's performance. Although occasionally slightly out of tune, Hill's guitar was crystal clear. His voice, which does not sound particularly strong on recordings, easily filled the hall.

Unlike last year, Dan Hill did not perform alone. John Shear, introduced as an old drinking buddy with partying habits not unlike Keith Moon, played a Fender rhodes and grand piano sparingly but effectively. His presence was most appreciated on "Let the Song Last Forever" and "Sometimes When We Touch" the effect of which would have been much less dramatic had Hill sung them seated with guitar. Shear also sang some tight vocal harmonies, the most effective on "Frozen in the Night". Overall, Shear's good but limited performance should provide a lesson for Dan Hill: the "intensity" of his songs may be projected with accompaniment equally as well as without. If he boosted his instrumentation, embarrassing

The most memorable aspect of the concert was Hill's constant concern with his own songwriting and profession. The message of such songs as "Seed of Musk" is that Dan Hill will not succumb to the star-making machinery, and will write and sing songs simply because that is what he loves to do. Reading this, cynics may sneer and remark that Dan Hill is really just laughing all the way to the bank. I would reply that "you had to be there." It is next to impossible to become cynical at a Dan Hill concert.

Corrections

On page 16 of our last issue the Dylan Thomas book review was written by R.V. Cupido, our apologies for the omission. Also, Jim Cormier's Elvis Costello review on page 18 was the victim of a misplaced line in the type-setting process. Simply insert "a pseudo-Bruce Springsteen composition," immediately after "Peace, Love and Understanding" and capitalize the following "Written" (easy, right?)

Beckoned back by a standing ovation, Hill performed one encore. Perched alone with his guitar he sang out: "You've got to hold on, to what you believe in, You've got to hold on, or else you'll fade." At that point, I believed that he believes in music for music's sake, and I think most of Grant Hall was with me. As long as people continue to share this belief, Dan Hill is unlikely to fade from the entertainment scene.

Hardcore's thrust is a moral matter

Mark Henderson

We've been told that the era of the permissive society is over, and here's a movie to prove it. Hardcore is an extremely morose drama possessing an hallucinatory vision of reactionary morality. It seethes with rage and a single-minded purpose, devoid of any humour to offset its passionate and claustrophobic approach to a subject guaranteed to jar one's sense of hope or optimism. Paul Schrader's third directorial effort is a film of contrasts and contradictions. Set mainly in Los Angeles, its squalid environment of prostitution and pornography rivets our attention and fascination, while one man searches for his runaway daughter in a world he never imagined could exist.

Schrader's childhood was dominated by a strict Fundamentalist upbringing, which is of crucial importance to Hardcore. The hero of the film (overacted with aplomb by George C. Scott) lives in Grand Rapids, Schrader's home town. While the mid-Western setting is seen only briefly, its influence upon the whole film is pervasive: it allows the contrast of pornography and exploitation to assume deep meaning, a fundamental contradiction of values and philosophical attitudes. This however, is not the level upon which the film's drama is played out. Schrader deals us with a stacked deck and his emotionally wrought vision is the only perspective the film allows. Hardcore's message can't be dismissed easily. Schrader believes his message is of the utmost importance, once we are encouraged to share as the themes of moral and sexual prostitution become explicit, and at times unbearable.

George C. Scott portrays a middle-aged Calvinist and businessman whose only daughter (Kristen) guards him from loneliness and self-doubt. When she disappears on a trip to Disneyland, Scott hires a private detective to locate her. The only clue is a short porno film starring Kristen, who, it seems, has quickly learned the ins and outs of the movie business. When it is screened for her father, he cracks, being forced to confront a dilemma he hadn't imagined possible. He reacts by making the search a personal mission, and in true missionary fashion he travels to L.A. to rectify the grievous wrong inflicted by a heathen and bizarre sub-culture. The brutal violence used is condoned in the name of redemption and salvation, as Scott beats up a porno actor and massage parlour owner who gets in his way. His friendship with a confused prostitute who agrees to aid in finding Kristen, merely reinforces Scott's belief that mankind is evil and needs the guidance of the Lord to see the light of truth and righteousness.

Schrader's skill in creating a fictional hell-hole with the streets, sex shops, and motel rooms of urban America, gives Hardcore a visual dimension of hysteria and perversion. Many scenes are shot in searing blues and reds, creating an environment of immorality and excess. These primary colours express the exploitive and slick veneer that attracts and ultimately entraps the scared and self-destructive individuals it feeds upon. It isn't a world of realism where economic and social factors have much bearing. Schrader's world is one of a moralistic fiction that clashes viciously with the calm and serene life of Grand Rapids, where the family is posed as a sacred institution. The use of music emphasizes the dichotomy as well, the Christmas carols and organ music of the Grand Rapids scenes offset by the screaming rock-guitar solos and distorted synthesizers of L.A. The City of Angels and of Darkness.

Hardcore's relentless irony and hysteria are too extreme to be convincing. The message overwhelms the content to the point of suffocation, as Schrader urges us to consider the world he constructs in melodramatic and evaluative terms. He holds all of the aces and the other side of the coin is conspicuously absent. Sexual freedom leads to faithlessness and distorted values. Period. Don't question it. Take Schrader's word for it. As a spokesman for the "new morality", he makes a strong but illogical argument.

Record Reviews

Eddie Money: Life for the Taking
Reviewed by Brent Laviolette

I had suspected there was quite a rebel rock and roller lying behind that plasticised rock image Eddie Money gave us on his debut album. "Two Tickets to Paradise", the smash AM hit, ensured him a strong following and a lot of freedom and artistic control over subsequent efforts. Life for the Taking shows us a more in-depth Eddie Money, but the obvious commercial (AM oriented) production reeks of the likes of Boston, hollow and loud; the attempt to impress through sheer volume.

Life for the Taking is not without its obvious merits, however. His "Boston" approach to rock and roll is more sophisticated in subtle ways, especially lyrically. I would suspect that Eddie Money is very happy with where he is musically, and in this event, who am I to knock him simply because my taste in music veers sharply from the AM syndrome of "rock for rock's sake".

Though Eddie Money may not be entirely original in his approach, he does put out some pretty hefty beer drinking music such as "Can't Keep A Good Man Down". "Gimme Some Water" plays on that tired theme of the running desert bandit with some stunning guitar work by David Lindley (Jackson Browne's sidekick). "Rock and Roll the Place" is a fine piece of loud and proud rock, while "Maybe I'm a Fool" is generally more complex than the disco genre to which it belongs. "Maureen" is a brilliant, modern R & B tune, while "Call on Me" is an insipid ballad.

Obviously, there's quite a variety of material on Life for the Taking, some good, some

Chris De Burgh: Crusader reviewed by Julia Grunau

Chris De Burgh sees himself as a bard wandering from place to place singing simply (in performance, that means a stark stage and no laser show) of the past, love, and faith. If you didn't snicker at that then "Crusader" is an album you'll cherish. "Crusader" is a ballad album almost exclusively, and is arguably good as the 30-year-old's magnificent "Spanish Train and Other Stories". De Burgh is on home turf singing of palaces and kings, as he does in "The Girl With April in her Eyes" and "Crusader", he is descended from William the Conqueror and has lived in a castle. Andrew Powell, justly famed for his work with the Alan Parsons Project and Kate Bush, produced the album sensitively and sympathetically, highlighting Skaila Kanga's harp in "The Girl With April" and David Cripps' French Horn in "I Had the Love in my Eyes" in a way that tones down the drippy-sweet side of the melodies and lyrics while retaining their freshness.

The album's title track is not quite the tour-de-force it purports to be, but its eight minutes pass quickly. Throughout the record, and especially noticeable in "Something Else Again", De Burgh maintains a directness of approach and uncomplicated melody that remains in the mind for a long time. In these times of heavy metal rock and idiotic disco, De Burgh can be relied on. The day he features drum solos and a three-woman chorus called the "Burghettes" will be the day McDonald's becomes a Crown Corporation.

"new wave" at its best and most valid stage, where the mediums for expression are broadened and the method becomes as important as the ultimate goal. As a by-product of this creative search, some great modern poetry is being recorded. In this aspect, especially, Jules and the Polar Bears belong alongside Elvis and Tonio K. They're fresh, innovative and they pump out a great sound, alternating between an almost Steely Dan ballad style to raunch and roll.

The themes Jules and Polar Bears invoke range from the importance but near impossibility of love in a suspicious world to the imminent madness forced on us all by an oppressive, defeating society. In "Soul of Many Places" Jules Shear writes, "I will not / invade you / like a warrior / or a preacher / I will not / approve you / like a butcher / or a teacher", sounding highly reminiscent of poet Margaret Atwood. Insanity dominates the album and, in "Convict", Jules tells us "The nice thing about true hopelessness is that you don't have to try again". The final defeat comes as a welcome rest for this battered warrior.

Jules and the Polar Bears:

Got No Breeding
Reviewed by Brent Laviolette

Jules and the Polar Bears are methodic in their attack, it's isn't the random outpouring of social hatred that one often encounters in punk, but the message is essentially the same. What separates this group, aside from their carefully formulated presentation, is a degree of excellence in musicianship found very rarely over the last few years.

Happily, it has been my observation that the last two years have given the music business a real kick-in-the-ass. Creativity has finally become an important criteria for the industry moguls in their selection and relegation of recording contracts. People like Elvis Costello, Nick Lowe and Tonio K. represent the Musically, the band emphasises their lyric lines with a superb "helter-skelter" background. From Richard Bredice's blazing guitar solos to Jules' swift rambling vocals the listener's ears aren't given much rest on the album. Stephen Hague on keyboards slides from a jazz or free-styled piano and organ background to synthesized leads easily while David Beebe's drumming is well-emphasised though, for the most part, background.

There's a fair amount of electronic sophistication on the album but it doesn't intrude on the essential rock (with a smattering of reggae influence) format. Solo work is minimized and the obvious emphasis is on overall presentation. A wise decision since their total, I'm sure, is much greater than their individual potentials.

Synchro stars are champs

Wendy White

It took the pressure from a threatening McMaster club to spur every member of the Queen's Synchro team on to their best performance ever. In the Ontario finals that were held at McMaster this past weekend, Queen's and McMaster tied for the Provincial title with a total of 47 points each. Second place went to the University of Guelph with 22 points.

The battle started Friday night before a large crowd (many of which were Queen's supporters!). In a field of 18 solos, Laura Birtwhistle swam a personal best for a 6th place finish with a score of 64.8, while teammate Wendy White finished third. Wendy also swam for her best score, averaging 70 on her routine, despite the fact that due to technical difficulties she had to swim her solo twice!

The competition for team routines followed with Queen's chalking up their only first place finish in a single event. Linda Abbott, Laura Birtwhistle, Barb Elliott, Janet Fix, Mary Jackson, Karen Russell, Lynda Wiskin, Jeannie Hughes and Wendy White captured the team routine with a total of 66.6 points. In addition, the team's famous "down-the-drain" pattern was given front page coverage by the Hamilton Spectator! At the close of the competition on Friday, Queen's was leading by a single point.

Saturday morning our Novice Figures entrants came up with outstanding performances. Out of a field of 28 swimmers, Queen's Cathy Beaumont placed second with 55.082, Audrey Nicholson came third with 54.465 and Jeannie Hughes fourth with 52.714. Following this the team ran up against some stiff competition in Senior Figures.

however, the girls swam strongly to pick up some badly needed points. Janet Fix placed 6th with 60.348, Celeste Jennings 4th with 59.498 and Linda Abbott 12th with 56.349. Going into the last part of the competition - the team was down several points, however, the duets came through with brilliant performances to pick up the second and third positions. Celeste Jennings and Karen Russell swam for third place with 65.0 points, just trailing teammates Audrey Nicholson and Cathy Beaumont who picked up second with 65.5 points.

Synchro team routine earned first place marks

This competition demonstrated that Synchro at Queen's is a total team effort - their depth and skill were challenged last weekend - and they still came up with the points. Once again special thanks to the hard work of Coach Sheila Murphy, Manager Joanne King and Team Choreographer Norma Douglas. With seven of the twelve members graduating this year - the team appreciated your effort in helping to bring the cup back to Queen's for the 7th consecutive year!

Swimmers a respectable fifth

Ken Davies

The men's swim team placed fifth out of the twelve teams competing at the OUAA championships held at York over Reading Week.

LeRiche

The highlight of the meet was the fierce battle between the University of Toronto and Waterloo for the overall title. Toronto emerged victorious but both teams showed their strength as they combined to break 12 of the 16 existing OUAA records.

Queen's put on a respectable showing placing just behind McMaster and Western in the fight for third place. Captain Tim Dennis led the Gaels with his inspirational performances as he grabbed third spot in the 200 IM, first in the consolation final of the 100m breaststroke and second in the consolation final of the 400 IM. Rookie Jack Raleigh grabbed third in the gruelling 1500 freestyle, won the 400 freestyle consolation final and placed eighth in the 200 butterfly. Veteran George Bovell had an excellent meet, placing fifth in the 100 and 200 freestyle and fifth in the consolation 400 freestyle final. Bubbles Lawryniuk placed fifth in the 200 breaststroke, sixth in the 100 breaststroke and first in the consolation final of the 100 butterfly. John Lane came second in the 100 free consolation while Martin Feiertag, Giles LeRiche and Drew Gaels swim men fifth in 12 team OUAA meet.

Lagan all contributed to the point total by qualifying for finals. Several Queen's swimmers just missed making finals while posting personal best times including Chris Leuchter, Rick Cockfield, Andy Hasagawa, Jim Tasker, Joe Schnitker, Zero MacLure and Doug MacIntosh. Queen's divers ran into some stiff competition but gained invaluable experience for the future. The meet ended on a high note with the foursome of Lane, Feiertag, Dennis and Bovell stealing third place in the 400 relay in a new record time. Four Gaels are competing this weekend in Montreal at the Canadian championships which again should be dominated by Toronto and Waterloo.

Good prep for track OUAA's

Jeff Bellinger

In final preparation for the OUAA-OWIAA Track and Field championships the men's and women's teams from Queen's participated in two very competitive meets, the Ontario Senior Track championships and the St. Lawrence Invitational held in Canton, New York. Many athletes were competing to meet standards that would allow them to compete in the university championships. Due to rule changes, a maximum of twenty-one athletes are allowed to compete in each of the men's and women's sections; therefore the coaching staff at Queen's had the difficult task of naming a team of 42 from a squad of 70 athletes.

These recent meets have made the task of selecting a team extremely difficult because many athletes met their standards. The brightest light of the Queen's team at the present time is Charlie Hitchon who placed third in the 800m at the Ontario Seniors and first in the 600 yd with a Queen's record at the St. Lawrence Inv. Claus Rinne has also competed very well of late. His 8:16 3000 metres at the Seniors and winning performance of 9:07 in the 2 mile event at Canton puts him in a very competitive position right now. Jeff Storwick and Jim Morrison have also proved to everyone that they are in top shape with fine performances at both meets. Graham Boyle's double victory in the long and triple jumps at St. Lawrence is also a sign of good things to come.

Ann Webster is definitely the strength of the women's team. Her double victory in the 800m and 1500m events at the Seniors rates her as one of the top female runners in the country. Lee Ann Poland's progress in the middle distances at both meets has established herself as a top contender. Ann MacMillan's 10:25 3000m at the Seniors is also a top performance.

Many other Queen's athletes are now in top shape. Rookies Cathy Clarke, Sue Sangster, Heather Mitchell, Vicki Gibbons, Graeme MacWilliams, Dave Kuhn and Steve Waring all placed in the top two positions of their specialities at Canton. Bob Graham and Dale Freison have also been running well of late. All in all, the season has been a productive one and prospects for the OUAA OWIAA championships are bright.

Sail team second at Mardi Gras

Clayton Jaeger

The Queen's Sailing team, currently ranked number eight in North America, came up with a strong performance to capture second place in the Windjammer Regatta, hosted by Tulane University in New Orleans. The host school, ranked third in the continent, won the regatta which was sailed in light to medium air by accumulating 28 points. Queen's was only one point off the pace with 29. Yale University (ranked fifth) was third with 34 points, UCLA (winner of last year's two-man championships) had 36 points and Texas (ranked fourth) totalled 43 points. Ten schools in all competed in the regatta.

Terry McLaughlin with crew Fiona Kidd won the low point award in "A" division while Tony Sneland, Sari Cross finished tied for second in "B" division. Sandy Struthers was the very helpful alternate.

The team arrived in New Orleans four days prior to the competition to acclimatize themselves (coincidentally Mardi Gras was being held) and were able to get out in the 420's for a couple of hours of practice on Thursday and Friday. For the rusty northern sailors this practice time was invaluable.

Upcoming regattas include the Trux Umstead, March 24-25 and the Kennedy Cup (sailed in 44 foot ywals), April 27-29. Both events will be sailed out of the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis Maryland. Once again a reminder of the Canadian Intercollegiate Singlehanded Championships to be held at Geneva Park, Orillia in mid-May.

Athletic gold: a good investment?

Kevin Whitaker

This Thursday night in Dupuis auditorium, there will be a public debate on the future of Canadian Olympic policy. The question to be debated is whether or not Canada should be investing in and supporting the development of elite Canadian athletes, capable of winning Olympic medals. This is a serious problem which now confronts the Canadian citizen on a moral level as well as a financial one.

The panel for the debate consists of five members. Two of these guests are heavyweights in the world of Canadian amateur sport, both very obviously committed to the present Canadian Olympic sport policy. Lou Lefave is the Director of Sport Canada, which is the Federal Government's official representative in amateur sport. Richard Pound is the current President of the Canadian Olympic Association.

Squaring off against Pound and Lefave are two men who are opposed to the current Canadian Olympic policy for a number of reasons. Richard Helmes is an articulate sociologist from the University of Toronto, who received his Master's Degree in the Sociology of Sport here at Queen's University.

Nick Auf Der Maur is the President of the Montreal Citizen's Committee, a Montreal City Councilman and radio journalist. He was the most vocal of Drapeau's opponents before and throughout the Montreal Olympic project, and is a force to be reckoned with in Montreal civic politics. Auf Der Maur's book The Billion Dollar Game, is a scathing critique of Olympic mismanagement and the financial excesses of the team. The honour caps a fine season for Davidson who was also a member of the Olympic White team over the Christmas break.

Joining Davidson on the forward line are two other centres, Lou the current President of the Canadian Olympic Association.

Montreal Olympics. Both Helmes and Auf Der Maur will have some interesting and difficult questions for Pound and Lefave.

Bruce Kidd is the fifth panel athlete himself and teaches the Political Economy of Sport at the University of Toronto. Kidd's position will probably be a mediate one between the two extremes on the continuum of the mass participation versus elite development question.

Most of the debate will centre around the justification or lack of it for our current Olympic policy. The paramount question here is whether or not the international prestige which Canada receives through her Olympic athletes is worth the cost to the taxpayer, and if so, what does this prestige do for the fitness level of the average Canadian?

These are questions which many of us do not usually think about, but certainly concern us in our capacity as Canadian citizens. Hopefully the debate on Thursday night will provide some insight into a few of these problems, and promote some discussion of these matters.

The time and place for this public debate is Thursday March 8th at 8:00 PM in Dupuis Auditorium.

WIC FLICKS

Cathy Lawrence

Life Sciences advanced to the second round in WIC ice hockey playoff action last Tuesday night. Rehab's Barb Marsh picked up a hat trick as her team defeated Engineering 3-2. Anne Robertson displayed excellent technique in goal for the Engineers despite the loss. Nursing downed PHE 80 and 81 by a score of 3-1. Goals were scored by Dawn Nixon and Cheryl Eymann. Law's Peggy McCarthy led her team to victory in a close match over Geology 2-1.

Thursday night saw Cheryl Farnsworth of Arts net three as they defeated Five under Six by a score of 6-0. Patsy MacNamara claimed the shutout. These teams will advance to the quarter finals of the WIC ice hockey playoffs.

The winners of WIC bowling is once again the powerful King-Johnson line up. They can really "knock 'em dead". Rehab is the winner of WIC curling for 1979.

Comrades at arms

The stakes are high in international Russian Roulette. This time around, China and Vietnam seem to have skirted the precipice, but they came terrifyingly close.

To outsiders, recent events have been difficult even to keep track of, let alone understand. Vague rumblings of war trickled out to the Western world. It was all so incomprehensible. Vietnam, a Communist country, invading Cambodia, a Communist country, causing China (Communist) to invade Vietnam which caused the Soviet Union (Communist) to consider sending "volunteers" to help Vietnam. Why were fellow Communists at each others' throats?

The answer lies embedded in fundamental conflicts between the Soviet Union and China that arose shortly following the Communists' victory in the Chinese civil war of 1949. The USSR had played a crucial role in the victory of the Communists, and for the first four years China's revolutionaries had pursued policies in accordance with the strategies of their northern neighbours. Specifically, this involved an emphasis on industrialization, concentration on the cities, and a pragmatic approach to development.

But Mao Tse-tung, who quickly rose to the top of the Communist Party hierarchy, advocated a radically different approach. Instead of concentrating on the urban centres, Mao felt the revolution must be directed at the countryside. The peasants, not the "urban proletariat", were the focus of Mao's brand of communism. These ideas ran contrary to the fundamental precepts of Soviet communism, which was much more centralized.

The result was a falling out between the two countries. These ideological differences have been reinforced in recent years by border disputes which have occasionally erupted into violent confrontations.

The present conflict between China and Vietnam reflects this Sino-Soviet split. Vietnam, an ally (satellite) of USSR, invaded Cambodia, an ally (satellite) of China, provoking the Chinese, who, under the flimsy guise of alleged border violations, began an invasion of Vietnam.

The conflict could easily have erupted into a full-scale war, drawing in the Soviet Union and perhaps even engulfing the rest of the globe. China's recent indications that it will withdraw its forces in the near future must have come as great relief to world leaders, Western and Communist alike. Violent conflict has been de rigueur in this part of the world of late, and it is something with which the West has been signally unable to cope.

Asia is becoming a nucleus of discontent. Its stability — or instability — dramatically affects the stability of the world. If the lid can not be held down, the eruption may well have dire consequences for maintenance of peace in our time.

Funny you should say that

The traditional backslapping and advice accompanying the final reports of the outgoing AMS Executive took on a new perspective this year with the parting comments of John Koopman, former AMS Vice-President (Operations).

Said Koopman, "It is important to maintain a sense of humour. You've got to keep your ability to laugh. We all know the AMS is a big joke anyway." Despite the inherent sarcasm, Koopman managed to point out a continuing problem among student politicians and journalists alike — namely the temptation to take oneself too seriously.

Student politics, despite the additional responsibilities and duties placed on those who hold AMS positions, is still part-time and amateur in its orientation. As a result, it must also be viewed as a learning experience where mistakes periodically are made.

Without belittling the importance of student politics and, in particular, the AMS, there is always a lighter side.

Smoker damage

Vandals admit guilt

Karen McNeil

"Most of the Science '82 members responsible for damage caused after the '82 record smoker, have come forward, due to an investigation by the Engineering Society.

A large amount of vandalism had occurred on campus after the smoker, caused, at least in part, by members of the Engineering faculty. Eng. Soc. launched an investigation.

"On the Tuesday after the smoker, I was called into the Vice Principal's office to discuss the smoker", said Don Lindsay, Eng. Soc. President. "The next day an emergency meeting of Science '82 was called. We stressed the fact that it would be better if the individuals responsible would come forward on their own, and tried to get peer pressure to work. The meeting was then turned over to Science '82. They were very concerned, and did not think it was fair that all of them should have to pay."

According to one Science '82 member, "They told us that we, as individuals, were responsible for the damage, and they wanted us to own up and pay for it. We all agreed, but didn't think it would happen. I think one reason so many people came forward is because at the end of the

'82 elections, Don Lindsay stressed that after Sunday, they would come after those who had still not owned up."

By the Wednesday after Reading Week, however, most of those responsible had come forward. "Once the last three or four heard that the others had owned up, they came in too," said Lindsay.

Lindsay noted that "a large proportion of the damage was caused by non-students." Apparently, some friends from Kingston of those Engineering students from the smoker, were also involved.

Shortly after the record smoker, the Principal and all eleven Deans had a meeting and discussed what should happen in this situation, and in the future. It was decided that with the support of the principal, any similar situations involving Engineering students would be handled by Eng. Soc., rather than being taken to the Dean.

Any damages caused by the members of Science '82 will be paid for by the students responsible. In addition, they will all have to pay fines and post bonds with the Engineering Society, which will not be returned until Jan. first of next year.

Bob Wardrop has his blood pressure tested by Queen's nurse, Jenny Price. High blood pressure has become a major problem in North America.

Editors lose wages

John Koopman

"Poor budgeting and cost overruns may well leave Sarah Scott, the Editor of Sweven (1978) with less than twenty-five dollars for over five weeks of work during the summer of 1978.

In March 1978, on the recommendation of the Journal Editorial Board, the AMS Board of Directors granted $4000 to be used to partially finance a liberal arts magazine on campus. The situation was promising at this time; ASUS contributed $1000 and Advertising Manager Terry Reynolds sold $2500 of advertising. Salaries were to be paid from any excess remaining after all production costs had been met.

Scott and Lay-out Editor, Larry Rossignol, both expected to receive $500-700 for their efforts. Unfortunately production costs exceeded all estimates.

AMS Vice-President (Operations) Jeff Beck estimates the current excess at "roughly sixty dollars." Scott and Rossignol each have claim to approximately one third of this excess. Beck added that "about $1000 of

Volunteers to save library?

Deb MacLeod

Outer Council has approved the report of the Education Commission's "Think Tank" on library assistance. The report consists of recommendations for student volunteers and educational programmes to help the library maintain efficiency levels in spite of government cutbacks.

Library assistance, one of "Think Tank's" primary concerns, is regarded by the committee as a more positive approach to the problem. Programmes will be implemented in the fall of 1979.

Vickie Steele, chairman of Think Tank and Education Commissioner, explained her position, "The reason why we're taking this approach is because last year we ran a lobbying campaign to inform students about the library's plight. This year, we decided to work with the people, and the two programmes are our attempt to do something more positive instead of complaining." Vickie Steele and Jeff Kofman of Think Tank have worked to develop the programmes since November, 1978.

Student volunteer positions would involve manning desks during off hours and helping with book security to prevent losses and thefts. Such jobs wouldn't interfere with the unionized staff.

Volunteers would come from the Student Volunteer Bureau. Vickie Steele added that tentative questions which were sent out regarding willingness to volunteer received "surprisingly quite positive" replies.

Educational programmes of free sessions on proper researching would be conducted at no cost to the students.

Commissioners chosen

Warren Everson

The AMS Executive has announced the new slate of commissioners for 1979-80.

Internal Affairs will be directed by Janet Emmett, a third year Arts student, while her former running mate in the ASUS elections, Glenn Smith will take charge of External Affairs.

Clayton Jaeger, who ran the "Scoop" lecture series this year will take over Education (C.J.) is a third year Commerce student.

The Campus Activities Commission will be under the direction of John Williamson, a second year Arts, and Mike Birchard, former Chief Returning Officer for the AMS, will step up to the position of QSA Director.

advertising is still outstanding and uncollected." It is impossible to estimate how much of this advertising, if any, will eventually be collected.

Scott and Rossignol were aware that their remuneration would depend entirely upon the financial success of the magazine. AMS sources said. At the board meeting in which the grant was approved they made it very clear that their reason for involvement with Sweven was to produce a liberal arts magazine on campus and not to make money.

All provinces represented in advisory council on federalism

Special

All of Canada's 10 provincial governments are represented on an advisory council recently formed by the Institute of Intergovernmental Relations at Queen's University.

As the only research organization in Canada devoted solely to unravelling the complex problems besetting our federal system, the institute plans to rely on the council to "bridge the gaps between academic analysis and public concern."

"The future of Canadian federalism is no longer a dry subject of interest only to the experts," says Institute Director Dr. Richard Simeon. "It has become the single most important political question confronting Canadians."

The council's role, as Dr. Simeon sees it, will be to advise the institute on the best activities to undertake, and to give the institute a broader national base.

The members of the 27-member council come from across Canada, and include: three provincial deputy ministers, one provincial minister, scholars from six Canadian universities, a member of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, a media representative and policy analysts from the C.D. Howe Research Institute and the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council.

The council is also a forum for informal discussion among members themselves, and a watchdog to ensure that the institute remains independent of any single agency—either public or private.

Founded in 1965 the institute conducts independent research on subjects relating to federalism and especially federal-provincial relations, and communicate its findings through publications, seminars and other activities.

Recent publications of the institute are: Must Canada Fail?, a collection of essays on the crisis in Confederation edited by Dr. Simeon; a Citizen's Guide to the Constitutional Debate, document for use by schools and the media, and a Review of Developments in Canadian Federalism, a look by research associate Doug Brown at changes to federalism during this past year.

Debators 2nd at Princeton

Special

The Queen's Debating Union placed second at the prestigious Adlai E. Stevenson Debating Tournament held at Princeton University on Feb. 23-4. Sixty-six teams attended the tournament from both Canadian and American universities.

Contestants debated both sides of the prepared topic, "First oneself, then others," and four rounds of impromptu topics such as "The atheist has no hope." In the final round between the top two teams, the Queen's team of David Corbett and Graham Sellers confronted Osgoode Law School's Pat Monahan and Lauren Yu. Queen's had won the tournament in 1977 and 1978, but missed the hat trick by six points this year.

Queen's was the only university with more than two debaters in the top ten. Of 132 speakers at the tournament, Graham Sellers, Gary Boyd and David Corbett placed fourth, fifth and sixth respectively, and Graham Sellers was named the best orator of the finalists.

OFS presents women's brief

Janet Brick

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) has presented the Provincial Government with a ten point program aimed at improving the status of women in the university community. An accompanying report outlines the effect cutbacks have on the accessibility, quality of, and job opportunities for university graduates, with an emphasis on women.

The program opposed the recommendation of the P.S. Ross report that tuition fees be related to program costs. This would make it financially impossible for many women to enter professional faculties, an area in which they are already under represented, the program said.

Cutbacks have reduced the number of child care facilities, forcing many women to attend university only part-time. Grants for part-time students have been virtually eliminated under OSAP, making education quite expensive.

According to the OFS, there are other flaws in the current OSAP system that discriminate against women. The program suggests reducing "independent status" requirements for grant eligibility from three years to two. The grant eligibility period limits should be abolished in order that women can extend their studies beyond 8 terms. The report cites statistics indicating that women earn less over the summer employment period, making the problem of finances especially crucial. The OFS program calls for pragmatic steps in each of these areas, as well as recommending the government conduct a study on the accessibility of post-secondary education for women.

The program is also concerned with the quality of education. It calls for a "reverse of the underfunding policy which is causing the percentage of female faculty to decline. At the same time, women's studies programs must be expanded."

Student paper stops publishing

Staff

The University of Lethbridge's student newspaper The Meliorist has ceased publication until negotiations on funding between Meliorist staff and the student union are completed.

The paper was to receive $3.50 per student but student's council carried a motion last Oct. 16 stating that the Meliorist will not get the money. Last year, the newspaper received a $3.50 portion of the student fee based on the results of a referendum held in March 1977.

A referendum to deal with the problem of the status of Meliorist funding was announced in late November of this academic year but according to one staff member, the student union did not consult the staff over the wording of the motion. That referendum failed to meet quorum.

The latest problem has been that the student union had unconstitutionally dissolved the Meliorist's publishing board, according to a staff member. The confrontation with the union has led to a loss of more than three-quarters of the staff.

Media coverage of Iran distorted and biased

Fiona Farrell

The news coverage of the revolution in Iran was anything but a success story, according to David North, Foreign Affairs Editor of Maclean's magazine.

Speaking in Stirling Hall Monday, North, the latest speaker in the Scoop series, gave a devastating description of the media's failure to report clearly on Iran.

He started his speech, entitled "Iran-Department of Misinformation" by saying: "I want to prove the premise that almost throughout the revolution news reaching Canada was muddled, inaccurate, biased, that it was almost impossible to glean why and what was going on and what it implied in the future for us." This misinformation stems largely from reportorial techniques, structure of journalism in Canada and the West, and active obstruction of U.S. and the Shah's intelligence services. U.S. influenced assumptions regarding foreign policy are another factor he dealt with extensively.

Regarding Iran he wanted to "stress more than anything that it's not necessarily a process to be regarded with fear." Information "underwritten by American security agencies created the impression of an enlightened, informed ruler threatened by religious fanatics on the fringes of society designed to appeal to the biases of liberal, quasi-Christian society." He contrasted examples of fiction in news coverage with reality.

"The Shah's 'agricultural reforms' destroyed what agriculture there was. Iran used to be self-sufficient and now has to import 50% of their staples."

"The women resumed wearing their black veils as a symbol of discontent under the Shah, not in agreement."

"The middle classes, who represent over 25% of the population were the groups most alienated by policies of the Shah."

"Fundamental fact that Iran depends solely on oil.... The removal of Iran from the role of tame poodle has greatly upset the balance of power in the Middle-East."

He raised the question, "Why this sudden suspension of disbelief" on the part of the media? "Journalists are only human...they are biased by their own views, those of proprietors, are citizens of countries...tend to react in stereotypes all are part of his answer. Specific areas in which the media went wrong over Iran included these problems:

"Had they understood the country better, that is, they didn't do their homework properly, or they wouldn't have accepted the rationale of the Shah. And they might have provided information as to impending events. Reporters on the ground took cues from local diplomatic corps who had isolated themselves from local society in Iran. Members of the social elite shaped the view of Iran."

There was a lack of linguists in Iran, a lack of unofficial sources. Events played a part in distortion, there wasn't time to report nuances."

In some regard the structure of North American media had an effect: its few alternative voices, lack of competition, concentration in a few proprietors. He added that members of the media were "almost to a man dedicated to truth, justice and the American way, and they all think that way. Democracy functions best when there are choices of points of view...Why does everything have to be seen through the distorting vision of East-West confrontation? It is a fundamental mistake of the U.S. to see everything in black and white terms."

He described "the Globe's Peking man as an exception who proves the rule" of Canada's heavy dependence on U.S. media. Direct results of this dependence include: "The foreign body of expertise is emaciated. Journalists do not get exposure they need to foreign events, and it shows. Canadians judge what's what through American eyes. Overall, truncating debate on one of the most important foreign policy issues since the end of the war in Indo-China."

He ended his speech by urging: "Would we not do better to be more self-sufficient, at least an alternative voice which would be one more check on the Department of Misinformation."

Kidnapping at Ottawa U.

Beth MacKenzie

Kidnappers struck at the University of Ottawa on February 22, capturing 10,000 copies of the campus newspaper, The Fulcrum/La Rotonde.

The criminals, represented by a youth wearing a black turtleneck over his face, stepped forward later that week to receive second prize in the "best take" division of the Residence Carnival.

According to the March 1 edition of The Fulcrum/La Rotonde, Editor-in-Chief, Steve Coughlin, was informed of the heist by a ransom note left on his office door. The note explained that the papers, contained a special election supplement, had been kidnapped by Matthew Price-Richard because his election platform had not been printed.

A check revealed that not only was Matthew Price-Richard not a candidate, but that there was no student by that name registered at the University of Ottawa.

Later that day an anonymous phone caller informed Fulcrum/Rotonde staff of the true motive behind the crime, but did not state if or when the papers would be returned. 5,000 extra copies of the election supplement had to be ordered at an extra cost in order to prevent disruption of the election campaigns.

Campus security found the entire press run, intact, in a basement storeroom of the Leblanc Residence at Thursday night.

Simple life pays off

Tom Mohr
Self-sufficient living is a hobby, according to Dr. Smallman of the Queen's Biology Department. While some go sailing or play golf, Smallman says he's quite happy to chop wood for his Findlay Oval wood stove, or work in his garden, or collect eggs from the chickens he raises, or even honey from the bees he keeps.

Smallman's back-to-basics approach to living has paid off in practical terms.

"As for our wood stove, we get heat as a spinoff from cooking, and cooking as a spinoff from heating. We never use our electric stove in the wintertime. We buy no vegetables, our garden supplies that. We have a mill in which we grind our own wheat, and my wife makes all our own bread. It's about the only way these days to ensure you're not eating food that is contaminated with additives and such," he said.

More than that, though, the professor sees in his style of living a chance to gain some degree of independence.

"The economic argument is a nice pat justification for doing something we really enjoy. It's the way I get my exercise, splitting wood. It's my hobby, my refreshment. Doing what we're doing means we don't have to knuckle under to the big multinational corporations," he said.

Self-sufficient living is not for everybody, Smallman admits. The initial capital costs are high, and it involves a good bit of hard work. But even city dwellers can set up a pretty adequate garden, and begin to cut down on food costs.

"I wouldn't want to deceive anyone, though, into thinking that with $200, you can go out and be self-sufficient. It's not that simple," he added.

The Harrowsmith style of life can for some people be an escape mechanism from today's problems, he admitted. But it doesn't have to be.

"It's possible for you to shut yourself off. I've never done that, none of my friends are like that. This kind of life has taught me about the old rural ethic, which is for everyone to help each other. That's not running away," he said.

On and off campus the challenge of outwitting computers for beer, bucks, or just out of sheer braininess is attracting growing numbers.

Do campuses brew computer criminals?

Doug Ronson

At the University of Waterloo a student recently won a pitcher of beer for his efforts. At the University of Alberta two students were given a year's probation for theft by performing the same deed.

These students have all broken their university computer codes, thereby gaining access to all computer files and the billing system. Their reasons range from the challenge of breaking the code to checking other students' assignments.

At Waterloo, computer science professor, Morvin Gentleman offers a free pitcher of beer to any student who can breach the security of the system.

Gentleman said his aim was to find the "bugs in the system." His idea worked; until two years ago he awarded two dozen pitchers yearly, now the number has reduced dramatically.

Other students have cracked the system without Gentleman's knowledge, using the computer to send anonymous "nasty" letters to faculty members.

At the University of Alberta two students weren't so lucky. They were convicted January 19th of deliberately "crashing" the campus computer system.

Both admitted to cracking a code to alter computer time billing and gaining access to the computer files. The two students were given one year's suspended sentences and a year of probation on theft charges.

Bogstad chosen to direct Donald Gordon Centre

Special

Finn Bogstad, co-ordinator of student services at Queen's University for the past seven years, has recently been named executive director of the Donald Gordon Centre for Continuing Education. Effective April 1, Mr. Bogstad succeeds Hugh Smith whose leaving the university to open his own business locally.

A graduate of the Royal Military College and of Queen's Mr. Bogstad served in the Royal Canadian Air Force and taught high school in the Hamilton area before joining Queen's staff in 1966, as project co-ordinator in the computing centre. His involvement with student services began in 1972 when he became student services liaison officer, then, in 1974, was named co-ordinator of student affairs and student services—his current position.

Benches become political

Ghetto subversives

The Editor,
We are writing concerning David Brown's article in last Friday's Journal, "Rectifying a Sorry State". We feel he is fully justified in his concern with this matter, as it is a blatant example of the deteriorating condition of the Queen's-Kingston community relationship. We fully agree that this situation has gone far enough.

However, in view of the fact that the bench was returned prior to the publication of your article, do you not think that the vehement attack on the students involved, irresponsible as they may have been, was rather uncalled for? Being acquaintances of those who, believe, perpetrated this vile deed, we can totally sympathize with their actions. They are a group of concerned, conscientious students who are only trying to let their views be known; views which should reflect those of the entire Queen's student population.

Anybody who is aware of the goings on of the Sydenham Ratepayer's Association will realize the all-out frontal attack they are waging against the youth of today. While the stealing of the bench from in front of the laundromat may have been a petty form of rebellious expression, the act was dedicated to a member of the Sydenham Establishment and it was felt that this was the only useful, non-violent means of expression of our view of the SRA's proposition.

Queen's is not presently faced with a severe housing shortage but if a fourth-rate municipal association is allowed to undermine Kingston's economic sustenance, there surely will be. The fact that the student landlords of Kingston, the AMS included, are in cahoots with the SRA in driving students out of Sydenham Ward so as to create fierce competition for accommodation, resulting in exorbitant rents is a foul example of how capitalism discriminates against students. At the present time, a good portion of the Kingston community does not deserve our respect or cooperation.

The Words Past redemption

The Editor,
Having spent four years at this country club for the sons and daughters of the rich and near rich I have been well exposed to the various activity groups on campus. While I can confidently state that most play an active and beneficial role, there is one that does little but viciously divide the university into various factions and socialize students towards a highly sexist viewpoint. I speak of that toilet paper by-product, Golden Worlds.

Writers whose only claim to fortune is being capable of combining ten single syllable obscenities in a sentence and humour sections that seem to gain their inspirational ideas from old copies of Screw and Study magazine are not in my mind a proper and beneficial utilization of student fees.

I can only assume that the editors and all those involved in this contemptuous rag are sadly void of any moral conviction. Their unnatural passion for ribald humour and candid pictures provides evidence of a group of individuals without spiritual balance or respect for the values that society holds dear.

For years I have been firmly convinced that these pitiable young men and women were without hope, trapped in a world of sin and a subculture of sex and violence. However, in past days I have been informed of the miraculous case of a similarly deviant individual who was rescued from this lifestyle. I can only pray that the happiness that Larry Flynt has found in devoting his time to the benefit of society will also, in the future, act as an inspirational example for our own campus deviants.

Islamic women enjoy full equality

The Editor,

It was really shameful to see the photo featured on the first page of Queen's Journal last Friday. The Ayatollah's influence was represented by the wedding of a masked girl in the Queen's Pub. Is that all that a newspaper of a well-established university sees in Islam?

Veiled women are not related to Islam any more than drunken persons or unwed mothers are related to Christianity. A moslem woman is expected to respect herself and force others to respect her by not exploiting her body; is this wrong? Veils are the result of going to the utmost extreme as well as mixing and uniting religion with traditions. All that Islam asks of women is decency in dressing. Islam treats women as human beings with personalities, not just as sex objects or beautiful creatures to be looked at and admired but never taken seriously.

God created man and He knows that almost all men can never think of a woman's mind when they see her body, no matter how much freedom they are given (as in the Western world). Thus Moslem women were asked to dress decently outside their homes (but not necessarily go to the extent of a veil).

Anyone who has tried to learn about the Islamic religion will come to know the true positions of women in such a society.

Islam evolved from a tribal society where newly-born females were considered a great shame to the extent that they were often buried alive by their fathers. On the other hand, in the Islamic society established later, women were given their complete rights as human beings equal to men. For the first time in the history of mankind, women were granted the legitimate right to inherit and own personal property. Five hundred years later, in the nineteenth century, Western women started to enjoy these same basic rights. During the prophets' time, women fought with men in wars, studied with them in mosques and were no longer merely bedmates.

The Koran is filled with verses repeating that no human being, be it man or woman, black or white, Arab or Iranian, is preferred over another except by their own good deeds and true beliefs.

I can understand the Journal's photo only in view of the anti-Islamic trend that is so popular these days. It seems that the Western world is attempting to forget its previous anti-Jewish behaviour by outlining its prejudices against the Islamic religion. Unfortunately, Moslems have not yet been able to make good use of this in the same way that the Jews did and are still doing.

Breaking the Monopoly

Jeffrey Austin

Once again I note that our Middle East friends are preparing to raise the price of oil, and, because of their monopoly, they hold a virtual stranglehold on a world that must have oil to function. It seems incredible at times, that countries as powerful as the United States appear to be incapable to do anything about the present situation. So, it was with some interest that I read an article written by Craig Karpel, director of Council of Energy Policies in New York, which suggested ten ways to break the OPEC monopoly.

According to Karpel, the price of oil in a competitive market should probably be 7 dollars to 10 dollars below the present world price. Oil from the Middle East is estimated to cost 25 cents a barrel to produce, yet sells for 13 dollars. This represents a profit equivalent to each and every Arab receiving an income of nearly $8,000 per year. Yet, despite the tremendous amount of money earned from oil exports, it appears that OPEC is in fact in a much more fragile state than our news media would have us believe. Karpel's methods of dismantling OPEC reveal the internal weaknesses of the cartel's structures, as well as show the intrinsic strengths of the Western nations. Karpel's plans are as follows:

1) We must adopt a strategy of oil proliferation. This demands that we must support all non-OPEC oil exploration and development. It is still possible to economically produce more oil than the world needs. In such case, OPEC members, fearing export reductions, might be forced to reduce their prices to retain their share of the world market.

2) Support a futures market in petroleum products. If contracts for future delivery of oil products come to be widely traded on world markets, prices of petroleum products will fall in a slack market. As major oil companies see the prices of the refining division products declining, they will have no choice but to press OPEC to cut crude oil prices.

3) Implement an oil import quota auction system. In such a system a country would need to possess auctioned tickets to be allowed to ship oil to specified countries. These tickets would be auctioned off on a yearly basis. In this case, OPEC countries would either buy these tickets or lose their share of the market. If OPEC tried to sell their oil elsewhere in the midst of the current world glut, OPEC prices would crumble.

4) Increase the size of oil stockpiles. In the United States, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve of one billion barrels is only good for a 3 month period. This should be increased to at least a one year reserve, or 4 billion barrels.

5) License exports to OPEC countries. By holding up exports of certain machinery, planes and military equipment, the Western World's bargaining position could be strengthened with oil producing countries.

6) Deny arms to countries that raise prices or cut production. Western weapons are the most sophisticated in the world at present, and Arab demand for them is high. Arms sales to OPEC countries should be contingent on their long-term performance in meeting Western energy needs.

These methods, it seems, all appear to be quite conceivable. However, groups such as large oil companies who stand to gain from the inflated oil prices, have lobbied strongly against any such actions. Even so, the condition of OPEC appears to be declining. Oil producing countries are facing a steadily more resistant and determined Western world. OPEC countries which are greatly in debt, such as Saudi Arabia (they owe an estimated 87 billion dollars), cannot afford to cut off Western supplies in fear of losing valuable profits. Increased oil exploration in non-

OPEC countries has already resulted in a significant increase of non-OPEC oil reserves. The most significant case being Mexico, whose proven reserves have risen from 2.8 billion barrels in 1973 to nearly 50 billion in 1978. Mexico may in fact become second only to Saudi Arabia in oil production. Estimated non-OPEC oil production is expected to increase by 8.5 million barrels a day in the next five years, while global consumption should only rise 5.5 million.

Thus, there is good reason to believe that future oil prices may in fact fall, due to competition of the oil producing countries to retain their share of the world market. The situation may in fact come sooner than we think if major discoveries are made in the near future in many of the yet unexplored potential oil traps left in the world. Who knows, someday we may all be telling our children of the old days when gas was a dollar a gallon, rather than the 1990 prices of 40 cents.

The best types of friends are novel ones, ones who can contribute something to your life that you would never have been capable of yourself.

I like June because she invents timeless things like rip-cords for snap-front ("heavy date") shirts, which reduces to a moment the previously wasteful hours spent in undoing an item of cumbersome clothing. She is a very innovative and thoughtful girl.

I like J.I. because she offers ever-helpful comments such as, "So-and-So would rather suck dead bears than go out with HER," remarks that are soothing to listen to when you are sure that your life is crashing down around your ears, and that So-and-So is dating fifteen different Penthouse Pets at once.

I like Louise because she reminds me sternly of propriety and uprightness when I am caught embracing a friend in the street. Friendship is all very well, warns Louise, but standards are standards and decent young ladies must be concerned with their reputations. I would forget this constantly if Louise were not about to remind me; I am greatly in her debt (and my parents thank her).

I like Michelle and Paula and Stephanie because they always remind me of the delight to be found in the sensual joys that Louise says are indecent—well, to be performed in private, anyway. As far as they go.

Alex makes me think; Mary makes me laugh; Ruth is my Rock of Gibraltar. And she is the first person who introduced me to port. What would I be without them? A fat bilious nonentity with a long neck and short legs. No more.

It has come to the attention of certain students of this fine institution (Queen's University) that their dealings with Finlay's Sports Spot as one of the sole contractors of faculty jackets, might have been a gross miscalculation. We are not saying that Finlay's should necessarily be condemned because of the time it is taking for Avon to make the jackets, but rather the way in which Finlay's is handling its public relations with students.

Our main complaint is that Finlay's fails to provide definitive answers to such simple questions as "Are our jackets in?" Numerous stories have been supplied as to the reasons why our jackets did not arrive on the stipulated date. Obviously we cannot refute these stories but we merely hope that in future Finlay's state either that our jackets are in or that they are not in. If Finlay's do not know when the jackets are coming in, it would be greatly appreciated if they would say so rather than raising false hopes with speculative information. Finally, we hope all concerned receive their jackets before the next eclipse.

Hope in the shifting sands

Gil Gross

Once again, there is a rising tide of hope and optimism here and in much of the Western world, that the latest attempt to forge a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt will succeed. Jimmy Carter arrives in the Middle East this week amid a growing sense of urgency, some have predicted that failure at this point would be an unmitigated disaster for Carter, for the United States and for the nations directly concerned.

As in the negotiations' two earlier dramatic moments, there is a great flurry of news coverage of the event. Alert and efficient correspondents in Cairo and Jerusalem, at the White House and at the State Department, have staked out almost every imaginable angle of the talks. They discuss, often with "highly placed officials", virtually every implication which may accompany either of the two most obvious scenarios: how the Palestinians will react if a treaty is signed and what will happen to the price of oil if no treaty is signed. As well, where will Begin stand if the stalemate continues? The list of questions answered with statistics and speculation, seems to be inexhaustible.

For some reason however, most of these respected people have limited themselves to a "yes or no" philosophy. They seem unable to conceive of future negotiations if the current effort breaks down, and they are convinced that Carter, Begin, Sadat and their countries will all live happily ever after if an agreement is reached.

The latter assumption is particularly flimsy. Most journalists and "highly placed officials" agree that a treaty is likely to be signed at some point in the foreseeable future. After all, they contend, all three parties would be serving their own vital interests by reaching an accord. But few of them have taken up the possibility that it could just as easily come to pass that some day, it will serve the best interests of one of the parties to abrogate such a treaty.

One need not look hard to find precedents. Did it not suit North Vietnam to overrun the South in 1975, setting aside an agreement which had been signed with pomp and fanfare only three years earlier? And what became of the "friendship pact" signed between Russia and Nazi Germany which lasted for the grand period from 1939 until the Panzers rolled into the Soviet Union in June 1941?

The fact is, we live in a very rapidly changing world. What is good news one day can turn sour overnight, friends become enemies almost as quickly as James Schlesinger can say "Ayatollah Khomeini". Just ask the Shah if he would feel as welcome in the United States today as he did just a few short months ago.

The Middle East in particular, is an area whose volatility and potential for conflict have outlived many a crusader, conqueror and peacemaker. Its shifting political sands have buried men and ideas in a

Ethics of euthanasia in Year of Child

In 1979 we celebrate the International Year of the Child, and the twenty-year anniversary of the signing of the U.N. Declaration of the Rights of the Child. One of these rights is "the right to special care, if handicapped".

In the Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto, a study of 50 Down's Syndrome babies born with bowel obstructions revealed that in 27 cases the children died because surgery was not performed. In a report of infant deaths in Yale-New Haven hospital, 43 deaths were attributable to the withholding of treatment from babies born with birth defects.

The arguments for allowing these children to die revolve around two issues: "the quality of life" and "the cost of care", with cost interpreted as emotional as well as financial costs. The "quality of life" argument has led to a new question - are these children really human? Certainly, the Anglican Church would have us believe that they are not. It's task force study on human life stated:

"An infant with severe neurological timeless void. Why should we believe that a piece of paper will hold up under the hot sun, that it won't shrivel and burn just as its authors might?

The reason is hope; if the possibility exists of breaking this deadly pattern and of bringing peace to the area, then all the efforts are immediately justified. And if all that emerges is a piece of paper of unknown lasting value, then so be it, for even a breath of peace would be a vast relief.

defects may not be "human" as defined earlier in this paper and it is a fundamental error to treat it as human."

In this they are expressing the opinion of a growing number of medical and non-medical people.

Not human. But even if he isn't human, he may feel pain as he dies. A report in Toronto Life claimed that "...even newborns without a brain experience the anguish of starvation. They don't know intellectual suffering, the kind that informs them that they are dying, and will never be who they might have been. They just know the pain of hunger."

Not human. But what is it, exactly, that isn't human? The child with anencephaly? The child with spina bifida? The Down's Syndrome child with a bowel obstruction?

Even the Anglican Task Force had problems with this one. To be human, they said, one must be able to relate with "himself, with his neighbour, and with God". According to this definition, a child with anencephaly would not be human, but the little girl with Down's Syndrome and a bowel obstruction would be acceptable.

Definitions are always subject to change, revision. Even the Anglican Task Force acknowledged the fact that whatever definition they developed, it would be useful for a relatively short period of time (five years was suggested by one member), after which it would have to be reworked. History has taught us that such definitions become broader, not narrower, with revision. And, ultimately, a person's rights may depend on whether he is included in the group "defined" as acceptable.

The right to special care, if handicapped. Will this ever be extended to all children? It would seem as if some advocate its extension to fewer and fewer children. I am sorry; that may not be true. It would seem as if some, advocating the extension of special care to all handicapped children, would define fewer and fewer of our newborns as "children".

Ingrid Luchsinger left months of torture and imprisonment behind her when she came to Canada in 1975. However this country has not provided her with much security. Today she and her husband are facing the possibility of summary deportation by the Canadian government with no chance of defending themselves of any charges and with no explanations of the government's decision.

Ingrid and Frederico originally came to Canada from Chile on a Minister's Permit. Most political refugees are given landed immigrants status within a year. However the Luchsingers' change in status has been delayed repeatedly by extensions of the Minister's Permits. Various explanations were given for the delay.

In May 1978 the Luchsingers were finally told that the RCMP had refused to give them clearance. Seven months later they were told, indirectly, that the matter had been referred to a Special Advisory Board, which deals with matters of national security.

They have never been told why their case was referred to the Board. Nor have they been told, even in general terms, what the allegations against them are, or who made them. They have not been offered a chance to defend themselves in any way.

Under the Immigration Act these proceedings are perfectly legal. Sections 39 to 42 of the Act contain provisions dealing with persons who are allegedly inadmissible to Canada on grounds of subversive, criminal, or terrorist activities.

In the case of a permanent resident suspected of such activities section 40 provides for a limited right to appeal to a hearing before a Special Advisory Board. The subject of such a hearing is entitled to notice, a summary statement of the nature of the allegations made against them (although there is no right to know all the allegations made or their source), to appear and call witnesses, and to be represented by counsel.

However the Luchsingers, because they are not permanent residents, do not even have these limited procedural protections. There is no right to a hearing, no right to make any statement or defence to the Board and most importantly, no right in the Act even to be informed that the matter is being considered by the Board.

It is difficult to see why the Luchsingers should be considered risks to National Security.

They have not been involved in armed resistance or violence either in Chile or in Canada.

When they were in Chile, Frederico and Ingrid were active supporters of the democratically elected government of Salvador Allende.

Frederico and Ingrid Luchsinger are liable, under present Canadian law, to summary deportation without ever being given any indication of the reason why, or a chance to respond to their accusers. If returned to Chile they face imprisonment and possible torture and death.

Although there seems to be no legal protections available to the Luchsingers, and others like them, public pressure might have an effect. Concerned people should write to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to inquire why the Luchsingers have not been granted landed immigrant status, and to demand that they be informed of the accusations against them, who their accusers are, and that they be given a fair opportunity to reply. The address is:

The Honourable Bud Cullen
Minister of Employment and Immigration Parliament Buildings
Ottawa, Ont.

Ingrid, a doctor, worked in a health program established by the Allende government to bring widespread medical services to the poor in Chile for the first time. Frederico was a biology student at the University of Chile.

Both were members of the establishment families and had serious political differences with their families which have never been reconciled.

On September 11, 1973 a military junta overthrew Allende's government.

Frederico was arrested by the military police on the day of the coup and expelled from University. Although he was released later the same day, he was forced to leave Temuco, the University town.

Frederico and Ingrid, who had met August, were married on November 6. One month later Ingrid was arrested by the DINA, the secret police force of Chile.

Out of fears for his safety, Frederico stopped sleeping at home and began to move around, suspecting that he would also be arrested. He came to Canada in December 1974 to seek political refuge.

Meanwhile Ingrid was held for 101 days in torture centers and concentration camps and was inflicted with torture, and threats that she was to be killed. At the end of her detention she was taken to the airport and expelled from the country. She arrived in Canada March 18, 1975.

Both the Luchsingers are presently working in Canada. Ingrid is completing her residency in Hamilton, at McMaster University. Frederico works with Stelco. They have been involved, as have many others, in the activities of the Chilean community in Canada.

The Canadian government has agreed that if the Luchsingers were to return to their country of origin they would be exposed to persecution and possibly imprisonment and death.

Frederico has not got a passport, and if they are deported for reasons of security it is unlikely that other countries will welcome them as refugees.

The legal counsel for the couple says they are under tremendous strain, helplessly awaiting the decision of the Special Advisory Board. Protests have been made on their behalf by a number of individuals and groups.

However time is running short. The resolution of the case is expected in April.

David Lewis was leader of the New Democratic Party (NDP) at the height of the "nationalist" debate over problems of Canadian economic development. The nationalists' concerns focused on the large amount of foreign direct investment in Canada and, more importantly, on the absence of any national strategy for dealing with this investment.

There was debate among the nationalists about the best way to deal with foreign investment. A few said that Canadian ownership of all major corporations in Canada was necessary. Others rejected this as too costly, saying that many benefits of control could be gained without the costs of ownership, through government incentives, restrictions or conditions imposed on foreign investors.

The NDP was the only major Canadian party to advocate a nationalist economic strategy of any sort. During the 1972-74 minority government period, when the NDP held the balance of power in parliament, the Foreign Investment Review Agency (FIRA) act was passed at the insistence of the NDP.

But FIRA has since shown itself to be virtually useless in improving the effects of foreign investment. Nonetheless, popular concern for the issue has declined sharply, and the Canadian government continues apparently content to proceed without any policy in this problem area.

David Lewis has since resigned as NDP leader. In an interview last December he gave his assessment of some obstacles to a national program for dealing with foreign investment and his opinion of the future of the issue.

Q. Given past popular support for a nationalist program, as shown in polls, why do you think the Liberal government has failed to take up the issue?

Lewis: They don't believe in it. The Liberals are continentalists, and always have been. They have been the political expression of the dominant economic class in Canada for a long time. In Canada, continentalism has been the way in which that capitalist class has been satisfied to live, and it resents any attempt to make basic changes.

Q. In recent years the issue seems to have lost much of its political importance, even though foreign takeovers and investment have not stopped. Why?

Lewis: It's very difficult to get people interested in being nationalist; the issue shoves itself aside. The worker work for these multinationals. The multinationals don't treat them any worse than the national organizations—often better, because they are larger and can afford it.

But if you want to approach the socialist objective democratically, to do it by elections, you have got to take into account peoples' fears and their prejudices, irrational though they may be. Then you can't nationalize everything within measurable years; you're dealing with a process rather than a turnover.

Q. Do you think that fear of the short-term costs of a nationalist strategy, perhaps in terms of employment, might be a great deterrent?

Lewis: I think that is used as the reason or excuse. But I don't think we would have a lowering of our living standards in the long run, and I don't think that is the governing reason (why the government has failed to implement a nationalist strategy). The governing reason is that they have no interest in such a program.

Q. Do you think it's too late for a nationalist strategy?

Lewis: It's such a massive job now, and it becomes more massive every day. Had I the opportunity, what I would do is difficult to say. I would certainly nationalize Imperial Oil, to have some kind of hold on the petroleum industry, so we don't rely for information entirely on lawyers.

Q. You would choose that sector over secondary manufacturing?

Lewis: Manufacturing is a much more difficult problem, though it is easy to write about. What you need there is rationalization and it's a much more risky business. I don't think it would make the slightest difference if one applied some of Walter Gordon's remedies and had a majority of Canadian capitalists on the boards of directors or had Canadians own most of the shares. The people who make a difference in the running of the corporation are the corporate investors, and in Canada they are generally continentalists.

Q. Do you think it is possible to separate ownership from control, and to gain more benefits from foreign investment, through government legislation?

Lewis: I think we have to. Since we can't put out the billions of dollars needed to take over the whole natural resources sector of the economy, the larger part will have to be controlled rather than owned and controlled. It is possible, but it calls, for a time, for some pretty stiff controls. Whether any government would have the guts to put them in would depend on the circumstances. Courage is also relative.

Q. What would you like to see happen in the future?

Lewis: I would like to see my party do better than they did when I was its leader, under a different person, and insist that it is an issue. But it is very difficult to do that in an election campaign, which is when the issues come to the fore.

One of the difficulties is that in order to speak to the people nowadays one can only do so through the electronic media. There is a time constraint on these things that is terrible; it is really the decapitation of the whole information structure, and when I say that you can't make it an issue in an election campaign I'm saying that from experience.

There were several speeches I made in '72 and '74 about the foreign ownership question, and if in the course of the speech I said something really negative about Stanfield or Trudeau, that got reported. The bit that is scandalous, belligerent or catchy will get on. The substance of what one has to say won't be there.

A look at the punk culture

Punk or Not to Punk

Robert Barry Francos

Recently, two words have arisen from the music field that have caused a slight revolution throughout the civilized music world. These two little words are "punk rock".

Now, the problem with these words is that no American band will admit to being a punk rock group. They will agree that you can be a punk rocker (e.g., someone who acts like a punk and listens to rock and roll). Many of the groups are filled with punks, such as The Ramones or The Dead Boys, or The Dictators, but call what they play punk rock and they will probably get very upset. People just figure that if you are a punk and play rock and roll, then you must be playing punk rock. Au contraire.

This term was coined by a music journalist (who shall remain nameless as he does not deserve any sort of notoriety) who had the "title" disease described often in sociology classes. He was not merely satisfied with calling it rock and roll. No, he had to term the music and style as "punk". Being prominent and read by many, the term caught on.

The main problem with this term is that the groups that are considered punk by the general press just cannot be categorized by one single word. Groups like Blondie, The Patti Smith Group, The Gramps or even Teenage Jesus and The Jerks (and you considered the Battered Wives a risque name) cannot be put under one title. They are all so different. It would be like taking Olivia Newton-John and putting her under the same heading as Grace Slick. It just doesn't fit.

What most of these groups call themselves are just plain "rock 'n' roll" bands. Patti Smith calls her group da "jazz-rock" band.

How to become a punk rock band?

Play certain clubs in New York City and you're stuck with the title. One of these clubs is the foremost rock 'n' roll showcase in the country (if not the world) called simple CBGB's.

Another is Max's Kansas City, which gained its fame as an acid rock hang-out in the late sixties. Others include Great Gildersleeves (which isn't), Trax and Harrah's (which until recently was a, if you'll pardon the expression, disco), to just name a few. The trouble is that these are just about the only places where you can get any kind of professional gigs at all.

Now comes the confusion. Yes, Virginia, there is such a thing as punk rock. But not in America. It is more or less confined in England. Many of you have probably heard of the financial problems that England seems to be having at the present time. Well, many of the young people seem to feel that there is no chance of survival and they have begun to get violent in both song and deed.

Following the sound of the American rock and roll bands (especially The Ramones), they broke off and started their own trends. The most famous of these groups were the now dissolved Sex Pistols. This group first broke into the scene with a song called "Anarchy In The U.K." ("I am an anti-christ/I am an anarchist/Don't know what I want/ But I know how to get it/I wanna destroy passersby/Cause I wanna be anarchy").

Other such bands include The Clash, X-Ray Specs, The Adverts, The Stranglers, The Cortinas, Eater, and the list goes on and on. Their total mission, it seems, is to bring some sort of a revolution to the country and try to change its political future as well as the monetary system. But, as Chris Stein of Blondie puts it, "Writing a song about revolution doesn't do anything."

As with all new trends, there is a fashion craze that follows. The first wave (early sixties) brought long hair and a loud sort of dressing style. The late sixties brought psychedelic rock and even longer hair, dirty used clothes, beads, headbands, etc. Then came the "Punk fashions," which was pushed by Macy's, a large (they claim the largest) department store. It started when the British, not being able to afford new clothes, had to do with what they had. Therefore, they held ripped clothes together with safety pins. After, ripped clothes and safety pins seemed to be the "in" thing to wear. By now, this is out of fashion, and the in thing is just a tee-shirt and a leather jacket (no matter

Also rising from this music is a style of literature called fanzines. What a fanzine is, is a magazine cheaply put out by fans on a very small basis. There have been fanzines from other sources (usually for fan clubs). They come from all over the world. Some of the more popular ones seem to be The Pig Paper from Toronto, 3rd Wave from New Jersey, Varulvian from Boston and Ffanzee from New York. They are informative and usually extremely well written. At this time, there must be well over 100 fanzines of this type in existence.

Now, the question may arise, "what's the difference between England's punk rock and America's New Wave (rock 'n' roll)?" Basically, it is one of attitude. The Americans, having lived through the late sixties period of political violence, know that it is worthless to protest since there is nothing you can really do. Therefore, apathy moved in and all the violence is taken out in song form ("I'd rather slash my wrists/And cut my throat/Then have to spend the night with you" or "You don't know what I can do with this ax/Chop off your head so you better relax" or even "I am the world's forgotten boy/The one who searches to destroy"), and the excitement is released through catharsis or dancing.

In England, the violence is present in both song and in action. Punks are always stompin' on, or jumping up and down on each other. The sixties in England were fairly peaceful, so the violence now comes to the surface. You must understand, though, that most people who listen to punk rock listen to new wave, and visa versa.

Now that the music is becoming very popular, many new bands are springing up. Some who've seemed to have "made it" are Blondie, The Ramones, The Cars and Devo (are they not men?) And be sure to keep your eyes open for The Nervus Rex, The Zantees, The B-Girls, and The Good Rock 'n' roll is here to stay!

La Parenté

Denise Gaucher

La Parenté, a French Canadian folklore dancing group from Laval University in Quebec City, will be at Queen's on Friday, March 9. The group will begin its performance, which takes place in the Skylight dining Room at 8:30pm, by presenting some traditional French Canadian folklore dances. After a brief intermission, members of the audience will have a chance to learn some of the dances and to participate along with La Parenté.

La Parenté was founded six years ago and consists mainly of students. Twenty of the 27 member group will be making the trip to Queen's. Many of the students involved with La Parenté have seriously studied folklore dancing and music, and many are involved in organizing 'folkloretheques', discotheques with folklore dancing. The group has performed several times in Quebec City and Montreal and is currently planning a two week trip to France to take place in the near future.

The man with "soul":

Muddy Waters

Dot Tuer

Willie Dixon said once that Muddy Waters has soul. What he meant by that statement can only be understood when Muddy himself climbs onto a stool in Grant Hall on Saturday night and wails out those incredibly high-energy blues. Now in his sixty-fourth year, Muddy still has the power to vitalize an audience by tapping his toe and strumming his guitar.

Learning guitar from Robert Johnson, Muddy has developed a fierce, raw, and rhythmically complex sound, using a slide with a chopping effect of his hand to achieve a unique 'bottleneck' style. Combining this instrument with a powerful and evocative voice, Muddy sings of lovin' women and booze, of voodoo and the mystic. Muddy sings the uninhibited slow-time funky blues. Reaching his zenith in the late fifties, his band has at times included Leroy Foster, Jimmy Rogers, Little Walter, Otis Spann, Luther Tucker, and Jimmy Cotton. Such tunes as Hoochie Coochie Man, Got My Mojo Working, Honey Bee, and Rollin' Stone, have inspired countless white performers.

In the mid-seventies, Muddy Waters experienced a musical renaissance. With Johnny Winters producing the albums, "Hard Again", and "I'm Ready", Muddy Waters' rejuvenation incorporated the use of raw recording with new material to reassert his primacy in the modern blues field. And on Saturday night, Queen's will have the opportunity to experience his high-powered and sensitive music for themselves. Only then, will one understand that Bill Broome caught this musician's essence when he said that "Muddy's real."

The master bluesman, 64 years young.

Here's your chance to see Citizen Kane

Mark Henderson

Contrary to popular - and not so popular - belief, Hollywood has been responsible for producing some quite essential examples of cinematic excellence. Within the huge infrastructure called the movie studio, certain individuals have persevered and directed films that almost justify Hollywood's dubious reputation for providing a mass medium of entertainment. Orson Welles is one of those people, whose two crowning achievements are being screened at the National Film Theatre this Saturday and Sunday evenings. Citizen Kane and The Magnificent Ambersons (Welles' first directorial efforts), still generate the power to profoundly move an audience as they did in the early 1940's. In almost every competition held to choose the "Best Ten Films" ever made, these two gems are almost always in the top 4 of 5; Citizen Kane is usually first!

Citizen Kane is arguably the finest drama created in Hollywood's long history. Made at RKO Pictures in 1941, it stars Orson Welles as a William Randolph Hearst-like newspaper magnate who is gradually destroyed by the power and wealth he accumulates. The film begins with his death, subsequently traced through a series of flashbacks, as a newspaper reporter searches for the meaning of the dying man's last word: Rosebud. Structured like a mystery, Welles' brilliant synthesis of various cinematic styles is a pleasure to experience, its complexity is simply overwhelming. After seeing it over ten times, I still have the urge to see it again, for there is always something more to be discovered.

The Magnificent Ambersons is more leisurely paced than Kane, less expressionistic but equally powerful and emotionally provocative. Using the industrialization of America and the rise of the automobile as a metaphorical backdrop, it traces the economic and cultural disintegration of the Ambersons, an aristocratic family that painfully succumbs to change. Joseph Cotton turns in a beautifully restrained performance as Eugene Morgan, an entrepreneur whose business is the "horseless carriage". His futile courting of Mrs. Amberson sets the melancholy tone of the film, exuding a nostalgic but critical atmosphere, pronouncing the death of a way of life. Stanley Cortez's camera-work is nothing short of inspirational. Whether gliding among the participants of spectacular ballroom festivity, or holding for three minutes as a character expresses emotional anguish, the use of deep focus subtly brings attention to the interweaving levels of the film's narrative.

Orson Welles represents - along with Erich von Stroheim and Fatty Arbuckle - one of Hollywood's greatest wastes of talent. While Citizen Kane created a storm of controversy, it was released intact. The Magnificent Ambersons though was mercilessly butchered with an artificial (and happy) ending tacked on at the studio's insistence. One can still witness the fragments of a true classic, but oh, what it could have been, had Welles been considered more than an upstart, an unruly genius. His subsequent films all have histories of conflict and compromise, and few have been as great as either Kane or Ambersons. They stand on their own as pillars among a crumbling ruin.

Hitchon sets Canadian record

Jeff Bellinger

When the final results had been tabulated and the Queen's men's indoor track and field team had realized that they had been narrowly defeated by the University of Toronto no one was more disappointed than head coach Rolf Lund.

Track star Charlie Hitchon -DAB

The team managed to win twelve medals in the competition - four of them gold. The seventeen points margin between the two top place teams represented the narrowest margin that the Queen's team ever managed against the perennially strong Toronto squad. The general consensus of the team was that they were bridesmaids again, but this time they taught the bouquet.

Impressive results were turned in by almost every member of the team (twenty personal bests were achieved), but the most impressive performance of the day came from Charlie Hitchon who broke the Canadian national record in the 600 metres. The Queen's men's team now hold three national marks. Hitchon also anchored the 4x400m relay team of Rob Miller, Jeff Storwick, and Jim Wilson which won the second of Queen's gold medals. Hitchon rounded out his day by capturing the silver medal in the 100m. Adam

Shoemaker, on the indoor track for the first time this year, won the 5000m with Claus Rinne placing third. Rookie Dave Kuhn pulled off the meet's biggest upset by taking the gold medal in the pole vault. Also in the field competition, Pete Becke placed second in the triple jump while Graham Boyle placed third in the long jump. Rookie Steve Waring grabbed the bronze in the high jump. Duncan Card placed second in the 50m and Jim Morrison placed third in the 50m hurdles. Both the 4x200m and the Distance Medley relay teams placed second to round out the Queen's medal performances.

Four Queen's records were broken or tied at the meet. Pete Becke surpassed the eleven year triple jump record by almost six inches. The five year old 600m record was broken by Hitchon. Shoemaker broke his own two year old record by almost two seconds in the 5000m. Waring's high jump effort tied the University high jump record.

-Spessat

All in all, the Queen's men performed very well. It has been a fine season and many thanks must go to head coach Rolf Lund and his coaching staff: Mike Baird, Dave Grant, Sue Bolton, Vic Gooding and Tony Verhoven - for all the help they gave to every athlete on the team.

Ann Webster caps super year

Jeff Bellinger

The Queen's women's track and field team placed fourth out of ten teams this weekend at the OWIAA championships held at the CNE in Toronto. They fell short of third place Waterloo by a mere five points. Western won the meet with Toronto placing second. The team has been plagued with injuries all year (two girls were put into casts with less than two weeks to go before the championships). At least a quarter of the team had suffered major injuries during the season.

The girls captured four medals in the meet. Ann Webster, a first year medical student, capped off one of the finest seasons a Queen's track athlete has ever had, with a double gold medal performance. She won a tactical 1500m and then followed two hours later with another winning performance, this time in the 1000m.

Her 1000m time smashed the national record by five seconds. Ann also anchored the sprint relay team which captured the silver medal. The only other medal came in the high jump with Sandy Cooper's bronze medal. Other notable performances came in the shot put and the 300m. Karen Rahn placed fifth in the shot while Ann MacMillan took sixth in the 300m.

Head coach Sue Bolton was pleased with the team's placing. Many of the athletes achieved personal bests in their events. It is hoped that the injury problem will be gone by next season.

Gymnastics wrapup

The women's gymnastic season wound to a halt on March 2 when Jayne McNeil represented Queen's at the National Championships at U.B.C. Jayne qualified 6th in the province to travel to Vancouver and placed 14th in the nation out of 36 competitors. At the OWIAA's on Feb. 17th, Jayne placed 6th on beam and floor in the Senior division of competition.

In the Junior division, Debbie Bradley placed 3rd on the uneven bars, and put in an excellent performance on all the events. Joan Meagher, in her first year of university competition placed 4th in floor exercise and shows great promise for the future. Other new team members, Janet Clark, Chris Reif and Charlene Cratt improved immensely and gained valuable experience in competition in events they had not worked on before. One year veteran Linda Elliot reached personal bests despite a series of injuries throughout the season.

Work continues for the gymnastic team, and the whole team can look forward to a successful season next year.

McNeil competes at nationals

Lee Prowse

Queen's only senior woman gymnast, Jayne McNeil, competed in the National Collegiate finals which were held last Friday and Saturday at the University of British Columbia. Teams and individuals from most Canadian universities competed and twenty of the thirty-six women were from Ontario schools. The team from the University of Alberta won the title.

In order to qualify for the finals, gymnasts had to have a combined event score (floor, vault, bars, beam) of 28.6 in their provincial finals.

Unfortunately for the competitors there were not enough judges due to insufficient funds. This meant that although Jayne warmed up at 5pm on Friday, she was not able to perform her beam routine until 11:45pm. The women's scores suffered because of fatigue, but it evened out said Jayne, because all the contestants "were in the same boat"

Despite this inconvenience Jayne placed well: 12th in the bars with a 7.7, 15th on the beam, 17th in vaulting with her best score 7.75, and 17th on the floor.

It was Jayne's seventh year of competition and second year representing Queen's. The team consisting of six juniors and one senior, was coached by Jane Milliken, a second year physical education student. The Junior women did well in the Ontario finals, but only seniors, who have attained a higher level of difficulty, are eligible for the Nationals.

Next year the team hopes to have more members. "There is a large range of ability between the junior and senior category, and although some skill is required, you don't have to be Ellie Schlegel."

BEWS NEWS

Mark Pentland

Play-off action in all of the team sports has been intense this week. Commerce 79 and PHE battled it out in two of the sports. Broomball and Hockey. Commerce 79 advanced to the finals in both of these sports. Meds provides the opposition for the hockey final, after defeating MBA in the semi. Mining will attempt to retain their title in the Broomball championship, following their victory in the semis over Civil.

Arts 80, Meds and Commerce 81 share play-off positions in both the Basketball play-offs and the Water Polo play-offs. Civil is in the Basketball play-off also, and Commerce 80 joins the others in the Water Polo league. Winners in both of these sports were unknown at the time of this writing, as their finals were held last night.

Curling continued its play-off schedule this week with Arts 80, Mechanical, Civil, Law 80, Electrical and MBA placing teams in the quarter-final positions. MBA, Commerce 80, Chemical, PHE, Civil, Commerce 79 and Mining all advanced to quarter-final action in Bowling, with the championship round to be determined last night.

With everything quickly coming to an end, don't forget the Annual Bews Banquet, to be held March 27th in the Underground. Let your Athletic Stick know if you are interested in attending so that he may secure tickets for you.

Bews broomball heads into the finals

WIC FLICKS

Cathy Lawrence

Congratulations to PHE, winners of the WIC floor hockey tournament. Arts 82 made a strong showing as did the Commerce mixed team, despite the loss of their captain Jill Fox who suffered from a cracked foot.

Meds won the WIC basketball championship after defeating Commerce 82 in a close match last week. In Wic ice hockey action PHE 82 triumphed over Life Sciences by a score of 6-1. PHE goals were scored by Lori Livingston, Ingrid Van Felder, Sue Clarey and Sue Squires. Mary-Jane Torrance put Life Sciences on the scoreboard. Nursing downed Rehab 5-4 in the most exciting match of the night. Hilary Black, Cheryl Eymann and Dawn Nixon scored for Nursing while Karen Lowther, in a brilliant display of puck handling, scored all four goals for Rehab. Talented Carolyn Grant also netted four as Arts defeated the Law squad 6-2. The remaining Arts goals were scored by Julie Maloney and Mary Flint. Peggy McCarthy and Jennifer Bradley scored for Law. The finals will be held Tuesday, March 13 at 8:30 so c'mon out and support your team.

Athletes of the Week

Charlie Hitchon and Anne Webster are our Athletes of the Week after their performances in the OUA and OWIAA Indoor Track and Field Championships which were held in Toronto last weekend.

Charlie set a Canadian Indoor record of 1:19.8 in the 600 meter final and also placed second in the 1000 meter race.

Anne set a Canadian Indoor record in the 1000 meter event and also won the 1500 meter final as well.

Both helped Queen's attain one of their finest showings on the Indoor Track Circuit in recent years.

Idea of student volunteers sound

Here's to the Education Commission's "Think Tank" on library assistance. In its report to Outer Council, it presents some constructive ideas on helping the library cope with financial constraints.

The use of student volunteers in the library system to accomplish tasks that would not be done at all if the workers were to be paid, is a clever, diplomatic idea which combines concern for unionized staff with concern for a more effective library.

Included in the report is a plan for continued pressure on the University administration, the Minister of Colleges and Universities, and the Ontario Council on University Affairs for greater attention to be given university library systems. That is an important element, because the crunch that our libraries feel is merely a reflection of draconian budget-slashing at a higher level. Student volunteers, while providing an immediate positive role, cannot be considered a long-term answer to financial constraint. In the final analysis, the responsibility rests on the lap of William Davis and his cohorts. Only they can bring higher education, and hence library systems, back into a high-priority position on the budget sheet.

Last year, the Education Commission organized a high-profile lobbying effort seeking to persuade university financial officers to increase the library's budget. The lobby involved circulation of a petition which was signed by 2,172 students. The tactic was a good one insofar as it went, but it did not proffer any suggestions which could be used by the libraries in maintaining acceptable standards. That is where this year's effort excels. It slaps wrists, but it also lends some sound, constructive advice.

BA: Across the board?

Recognizing that a B.A. graduate is not truly "educated" unless there has been exposure to a relatively broad range of knowledge, a joint student-staff committee has recently recommended a "core curriculum" for Artsci students. If adopted, students would be required to take at least one subject in each of the three main subject areas—the social sciences, pure science, and fine arts and humanities.

There are some arguments against the proposals. Students would be forced to do anything, the exposure might be superficial, and extreme student disinterest in an area might render the experience totally useless. There is no denying that for some, the courses taken would indeed be a waste of time.

But for the vast majority, being gently prodded into expanding their academic horizons would be to experience new and different thoughts, facts, methodologies, and people, which otherwise would have been missed. Respect, understanding, appreciation, and interest should develop towards new areas of study.

Also recommended was the development of new courses which would offer, as an alternative to the present standard "introductory" courses, ones more geared to those (especially upper year students) who wish to simply "try out" a subject area. Indeed, this alone would prompt many to experiment academically on their own initiative.

The proposals are certainly a step in the right direction. In fact maybe we should all be required to study specific subjects. How can anyone call himself "educated" without formal study of English? Or Philosophy? Or Sociology? Or Economics? The real problem is that we only have three or four years at university—with so much that we want to learn, and should learn.

A core curriculum is essential if the B.A. degree is to retain (or regain) its symbol of exposure to knowledge and representation of what can truly be called an education.

Canada Employment Centre for Students

Job Bank merger proposed

Janet Brick

Getting a summer job may be easier this year if the proposed amalgamation of Job Bank and the Canada Employment Centre for Students (CECS) put forth by Jeff Beck and Richard Binhammer passes at Thursday's Outer Council Meeting. The combined service would be run out of the John Deutsch University Center. The move could save the AMS $6000, as the funds allocated to CECS will cover most of the expenses.

Job Bank, a service run by the A.M.S., finds approximately 1400 casual summer jobs for Kingston area students. CECS places about 700 casual jobs, but has the added advantage of access to more full-time jobs, including some outside the province. All applications for Federal Government jobs must go through CECS. Having the combined resources of both centers on campus "will make job-hunting more efficient" according to Jeff Beck, A.M.S. Vice-President (Operations). He believes it will also encourage students to use the services of CECS, without changing the role of Job

Bank. There will be some changes in the structure of the service, if they are combined. Instead of 2 Job Bank directors, there will be 4 Student Placement Officers. Outer Council will have no voice in who is appointed, but Jeff Beck is confident that Queen's students will be adequately represented.

This is an experiment according to Beck, and the service will be evaluated next fall, in an attempt to improve its effectiveness.

Despite the style and precision of his foulshooting, Journal Managing Editor Tim Greenwood was unable to salvage second place for the AMS team in Saturday's wheelchair obstacle course and basketball competition at the Kingston Shopping Mall.

The day's events were organized by the Kingston March of Dimes in an attempt to make the average citizen aware of the kind of obstacles a handicapped person faces.

MP Flora McDonald and MLA Keith Norton were two of the local dignitaries who opened the activities with a race against the clock and the members of the Laser wheelchair basketball through the course. Despite having a spotter behind their chair all the celebrities had difficulties with the course.

The competition between the three wheelchair athletes from the Lasers, the representatives of the AMS [Binhammer, Beck, and Greenwood], and the Queen's jocks [John MacIntyre, Rob Ball and Fred Prinzen] was really a contest for second and third as the Lasers demonstrated to the novices what it takes to master a wheelchair.

Rise in housing vacancy outside ghetto

Doug Ronson

The student housing situation has improved from a few years ago due to a rise in the Kingston vacancy rate, according to University Housing Director John Richardson.

Richardson said that the Kingston vacancy rate increased to 6% this year. However, this rate falls to 3.1% on the periphery of the student ghetto, and is almost zero within Sydenham Ward itself.

The housing market is said to be in equilibrium when there is a 3% vacancy rate. Lower rates mean that landlords make higher profits and tenants do not have the choice they should.

"I'm not saying it's easy to find accommodation, but it is more readily available", Richardson said.

The Director advised students not to panic if they have not yet found a house. He noted that since students have to give only 60 days notice to their landlords if they intend to move, most landlords do not begin advertising their properties until March. "Of the houses that haven't been handed down to friends, most come on the market between now and mid-April." The Housing office is advising students to take a house only if they see what they want, where they want it, and at a price they can afford.

Elinor Mahoney, AMS Researcher, commented that despite the rise in the vacancy rate, the quality of housing is still deteriorating. "Assuming the rate stays high, however, within four years rents should go down or the quality of housing should improve," she said.

Native issues distorted

Staff

The greatest single problem facing northern Ontario is the tendency for southern based media to exaggerate and otherwise misrepresent northern affairs, said Mr. L. Bernier, MPP Kenora, and Minister of Northern Affairs, when he addressed Young Progressive Conservatives at Queen's last week.

Bernier felt that the plight of the Indian people's of the north is misrepresented by the press. He said that as a result of the radical native movement of the 60's and early 70's, the government has been forced to recognize the Indian nation as a legitimate interest. As a result, he stated that "we're making great strides in Native affairs."

Bernier didn't expand upon the details of this "progress", however when questioned about the specific problems of Indians in the Kenora area, Bernier stated that "thousands of Indians are leading healthy lives on isolated reserves yet are overshadowed by a few visible drunken Indians in the streets of Kenora." Yet he did admit that alcoholism is the greatest problem facing the native peoples as a whole.

Mr. Dennis Timbrell, Ontario Minister of Health, was also present to answer the questions posed by the small group of Young Progressive Conservatives. When discussing the prevalence of Ontario doctors leaving the OHIP program, Timbrell told the audience that the solution is to "enter into discussions with the Medical Association of Ontario in order to fully explain the OHIP program in order to convince them of its merits."

Head of Math at Queen's to contest Liberal nomination

Special

John Coleman, Head of the Department of Mathematics and Statistics, has announced his intention to seek the Liberal nomination for the Kingston and the Islands.

He expects a tough fight against Peter Beeman, the Reeve of Kingston Township, for the nomination. If he becomes the candidate he will then confront Flora MacDonald. According to Coleman "Miss MacDonald is a wily and experienced politician. Since she has been in thirty or more election campaigns, this must have been almost all she has been doing. Whereas I am a total innocent."

John Coleman has jumped into the fight because he (a) thinks Parliament needs people of proven ability in occupations other than fighting elections (b) believes basic long-range problems of Canada can be illuminated by a scientific mind (c) can see practically no persons of cabinet rank in the current PC line up (d) feels that Joe Clark, who some years ago was rejected by Peter Lougheed as possible cabinet material for the Alberta government, would be quite inadequate as P.M. at this crucial phase of Canadian history.

John Coleman

John Coleman has been Head of the Department of Mathematics and Statistics since 1960 when he came from the University of Toronto where he had been lecturing on I Year Calculus and IV Year Tensor Calculus and General Relativity. His research has been in group theory and mathematical physics. He has served for many years as Director of the International Centre. He has been active in Church circles and in visiting the Native Brotherhood of Millhaven Prison.

Decision making body enlarged from 10 to 30

ASUS votes to change structure

Rob Southcott

The Arts and Science Undergraduate Society has decided to redesign its current structure.

At its Annual Meeting last Wednesday, ASUS voted to change its present decision making body of ten people, to an Assembly of 30 people.

This Assembly, which will meet at least twice a month, will be composed of the four members of the ASUS executive, the four Year Presidents, nine ASUS Outer Council representatives, four Senators, six Divisional Representatives, and one representative from each of WIC, BEWS, and Physical Education.

The scheme formulated by former ASUS Vice-President Becky Farrar, received strong support from such people as the new ASUS President, Kevin Friesen. Friesen said that he hoped the new system would improve communication within ASUS. "It will make ASUS tighter," said Friesen, "and this way, we'll be able to discuss some sort of policy matters."

Friesen said that in the past, lack of representation and communication made the change necessary. He mentioned that some ASUS officers such as the First Year Representative and the Divisional Councillors, didn't know how they were supposed to work within the society.

By having ASUS Outer Council Representatives and Senators on the Assembly, Friesen said ASUS hopes to improve communication from ASUS to other bodies such as the Senate and AMS Outer Council.

In addition to the restructuring proposal, the meeting voted to support a plan for ASUS student scholarships, and voted to continue an ASUS-sponsored social week, such as Susie Q week this year.

This meeting also decided to grant $500 to Commerce House. The funds, whose allocation received almost full support from the meeting, will be used to furnish a study room in Commerce House.

Rob Southcott

Dr. Bette Stephenson, provincial Minister of Colleges and Universities was in Kingston Thursday to meet with officials of Queen's and other schools in the Kingston area.

When questioned on the issue of cutbacks in post-secondary education funding, Dr. Stephenson held fast to the provincial government's policy of this being "a time of restraint" in all social sectors.

In response to questions about what could help in this matter, Dr. Stephenson supported the idea of financial support from alumni. "I believe that every graduate of every university in the province of Ontario has an individual responsibility to provide some funding on a regular basis to the university from which they graduate," said Dr. Stephenson.

Problems with faculty jackets leads to formation of committee to ensure good prices, service

John Baktis

Steps are now being taken to ensure that the problems with this year's faculty jackets will not occur in the future. The Queen's Jacket Committee, formed in response to this year's confusion, will negotiate with a manufacturer this week in an effort to ensure reliable service and reasonable prices.

"We were all upset at the radical changes in colour and the size and shape of letters on this year's jackets," said Fred Jaques, one of the Committee's organizers. "Finlay's has had reportedly bad service and we hope to do better," he added.

The six-man Committee, which is composed of two members from each faculty, will deal directly with the manufacturer thereby eliminating the middle man and therefore resulting in cheaper prices. According to Jaques, Finlay's price for a jacket ordered now would be between $138 and $140. Although the Committee is still in the negotiating stage, the pricetag would be around $120. The Committee will negotiate this week with Canada Sports Wear which operates out of Toronto.

"Hopefully we can work out a long term contract" said Jaques. The Committee also stressed the desire for a shorter delivery time.

Commerce House was cited as the distributing center for the jackets.

"This would help to make the house more of a University thing," said Jaques.

The World in Brief...

Doug Ronson

Ottawa - Liberal MP Ralph Stewart crossed the floor of the House of Commons last week to join the Progressive Conservatives. Stewart, a Northern Ontario MP for 11 years, said that he was disenchanted with the Liberal government's business policies and the divisive administration of bilingualism in Canada.

Cairo - President Jimmy Carter arrived in Egypt Thursday in an effort to conclude an Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. However, after Carter's talks with President Anwar Sadat a number of issues remained unresolved, indicating that Carter's hope for quick agreement may be premature.

Kingston - In a desperate bid for freedom a Millhaven Penitentiary inmate gouged his eyes out last week. He and his girlfriend had planned that she would intercept the ambulance taking him to Hotel Dieu hospital and take him to safety in the United States. However, police learned about the plan and arrested the girl in downtown Kingston moments before the incident. Surgeons were only able to restore about 2% vision to one of the prisoner's eyes.

Chatham - An infant is missing and hundreds of residents had to be evacuated from this area due to flooding of the Thames River. Farmers have also lost thousands of bushels of soybean and corn due to the flooding. The provincial police said that the major cause of the flood is an ice jam near the mouth of the River.

Hanoi - While uncertainty surrounds the battle between Vietnam and China it appears that the war is almost over. China has agreed to begin withdrawing her troops and Hanoi has stated that it will not interfere with the action. However, Western analysts, noting that there is no evidence yet that there will be a major Chinese withdrawal, fear the Chinese may be simply redeploying for further attacks.

Nairobi - an offensive currently underway by Tanzanian troops and Ugandan exiles aimed at toppling President Idi Amin is reported as being 15 kilometres outside of Kampala and encountering little resistance.

Fight for Native rights

Sheila Croft

A national campaign for the recognition of the rights of northern native people will be kicked off in Ottawa tomorrow, when leaders of six Indian and Inuit organizations from Yukon to Labrador will present statements of their positions to the people of Canada in an attempt to have their demands taken seriously by the Minister of Indian Affairs.

Known as the "Northern Natives Rights Campaign", leaders of these groups will visit every major city in Canada to take their case directly to the people of the country. They will outline their positions on aboriginal rights, political self-determination, constitutional development, Indian Act revision, the Alaska Highway Natural Gas Pipeline and other proposed major resource development projects such as uranium exploration, Polar Gas Pipeline, liquefied natural gas tanker and hydro projects.

As a result of these presentations the Kingston Working Group for the Northern Native Rights Campaign will be holding an informal evening on March 18 at 7:30pm, in the Memorial Room of the City Hall, 211 Ontario Street. It will include a folk singer, drumming and dancing, and a discussion with local politicians on their stand on Northern Native Rights. Indian tea and scones will also be served.

Award-winning debaters

Dick Woodside

This past weekend saw the rebirth of the R.M.C. International Debating Tournament, last held five years ago. The superb mess dinner in combination with excellent organization by Peter Greenwood and his men will make the RMC tournament one of the premier events on the North American debating circuit.

The Queen's Debating Union fielded two teams Queen's A - Susan Smithyes and Andy Taylor and Queen's B - Dave Corbett and Dick Woodside. Queen's A performed admirably and won 3 of its 5 debates, while Queen's B won 2 of its debates. However, an average of 87% earned while debating in Opposition positions, allowed Queen's B to win the award for being the Best Opposition team in the tournament. The Best Government team was Osgoode A, who were beaten by Queen's B by a score of 98% to 84%.

Copping out is a cop-out

The Editor,

I believe I could use the words thought provoking to describe the recent Lifestyle edition of the Lictor and though I can empathize with many of the sentiments expressed, I was dismayed by the defeatist tone of several of the articles, particularly the Lictor Lictern.

I am certain that the Lictern writer spoke for many, myself included, when expressing a decided reluctance to submit to the kind of three piece suit and a house in suburbia conformity that exists in much of the working world. What I found dismayed however was the advocacy of a retreat from society into a life loosely constructed of experiential moments that would be funded by a government "foolish enough" to offer money. If the opinions expressed in this forum are representative of more than a few idealistic but disillusioned artists then we're in sad shape.

As even the dullest would have to admit, life in North America leaves a lot to be desired. There exists a mediocrity in much of everyday life which is partly the result of the levelling effects of the status quo. The Lictern writer perceives this, yet seems to suggest any change is impossible and any attempts futile. With such an attitude there is little danger of any fundamental change in our society.

The route of action they suggest is one of inaction which is the easiest and least costly route to take. The argument offered is inconsistent and lacks any notion of self sufficiency, ingenuity, initiative or social responsibility.

The inconsistency lies in their continuing assertion that we become what we do and then encouraging the dissatisfied to take on a bohemian lifestyle funded by the government. Using their own argument it would seemingly not be long before this dependency infected the rest of their lives. Ergo, by living as leeches they would become leeches.

Even in a society as objectionable to the idealists and artists among us as our own, there is room for self sufficiency. There are alternatives beyond escapism or running away.

Before we begin the aimless life of wandering escape from a life of civil servitude, ponder a statement made by a writer of long ago: "It is better to light a single candle than to curse the darkness"

Refuting an historic illusion of innocence

Dave Duff

In all political systems there must be a trade off between civil liberties and national security. The Soviet Union, a country that has historically felt the need for the latter, reflects this in its structure. The United States and Canada, on the other hand, have been oriented towards maximizing personal freedoms - or have they?

Once again, the R.C.M.P. has been found where it does not belong. This time the Mounties were digging into family allowance and old age pension files - breaking the law in order to "get their man". By now, Canadians should have realized that these infringements upon civil liberties are not merely isolated cases. In light of all the recent accusations of R.C.M.P. wrongdoing, one might even say that they are happening constantly.

There is a lesson to be learned from this. Canadians should recognize that no political system is or can be perfect in providing for the freedom of its citizens. Considerations of national security or national interest often put limits on liberties. This is a lesson that the United States, more than any other nation, needs to learn. Vietnam and Watergate should have made it clear that the U.S. is in no position to act as the moral judge of the entire world. Yet this is just what President Carter has been doing in his human rights campaign. This messianic outlook is just as great a threat to world peace as "Soviet hegemony" (as the Chinese put it - while they invade Vietnam!)

"STICKY FINGERS"

The various disclosures about the R.C.M.P. should act as a strong medicine to keep Canada free from the infection that has plagued the United States for more than a century - the illusion of innocence. Certainly, Canadians should try to put an end to the illegal activities of the R.C.M.P. and other government bodies, but recognition of our own shortcomings should help us to accept those of other nations. Tolerance of others is just as important as the realization of our own ideals.

Band-aid solutions do little to relieve crisis

Paul D. Tinari

From the beginning, it has become apparent that the Conservatives intend to base a large portion of the election campaign on the Government's energy policy. Clark's lack of background in Canadian energy policy was made painfully apparent in a speech delivered in Montreal, where he tried to convince his audience that the Conservative party is capable of coming to grips with the looming energy crisis.

Clark claimed that he and his party would strive, if elected, to make Canada self-sufficient in energy by the end of the next decade. This, he said, could be accomplished by stepping up production and distribution of Western Canadian oil, by building several new gas pipelines linking the northern and western fields with the Eastern markets and by more intensive processing of the tar sands.

This sounds very good of course and could even manage to impress large numbers of voters, but Clark is notorious for reducing Canada's most difficult problems to simple black and white issues. It should be kept in mind that Canada's present energy policy, which was termed wasteful and inefficient by Mr. Clark, was in part formulated by the last Conservative government of Canada under Diefenbaker. Since that time the Trudeau administration has attempted to turn Canada from a country of mass energy consumption and wastage to one where energy resources, both domestic and abroad, are treated with the respect they deserve.

Clark claimed that one solution to Canada's energy problem is to switch emphasis from oil to natural gas. But perhaps he is forgetting that one third of our energy consumption is directly linked to transportation, and cars and trucks are unlikely to run very far on tankfuls of natural gas. The fact remains, most of our oil is imported, and the point has now been reached where Canada's energy consumption is so high that our domestic supplies, even if fully exploited, could barely carry us to the edge of the next century.

What Canada needs are good solid steps towards the elimination of energy wastage, and large scale implementation of all forms of alternate sources of energy. In England, the Government has long ago realized that the North Sea oil reserves will not last forever, so they are pouring huge sums into wave, wind, and solar energy.

Square meal, fair deal

The Editor,

It is puzzling why people prefer banal criticism to praise when offering an opinion. I am referring to the letter of March 6 concerning the Arts & Science Formal. The executive of Arts '80, especially Cathy Evans, worked long and hard to provide students with a first-rate formal.

Criticisms of the Formal included the price of tickets, line ups, the choice of win, the type of glasses, and even the clearing of tables. Tickets cost $30 per couple and included dinner, wine, and two bands in the enjoyable atmosphere of the Austrian Club. This is not an outrageous sum when one considers that a meal outside the McDonalds or Leonard Cafeteria costs between $20 and $30, excluding wine. Line-ups are inevitable when the meal is served as a buffet but I don't see how this forced table-mates to eat in shifts. Lining up as a group, and subsequently eating together is not a difficult task unless one is mentally defective, pitifully dumb, or both.

There is no pride in the fact that as Canadians, we are the most energy intensive nation per capital on earth. It would be utter foolishness to think that we will be spared from the effects of the declining availability of fossil fuels. Clark is making a grave mistake if he thinks that new pipelines will provide a solution. Rather, the answer lies in curbing demand. Carter has learned the hard way that it is easy to talk about improvements in energy policy, but it is extremely difficult to actually put such proposed changes into effect.

Our future generals?

Tim Greenwood

Most of us at Queen's are content to live within the boundaries prescribed by university life, arranging our lives around classes and assignments and having little to fear outside of failing grades, or having nothing to do on a weekend.

Yet there is an intrepid band of students who regularly and enthusiastically venture beyond the ordinary to face dangers many would have difficulty even imagining. It would not be an extraordinary night for one of this bunch to narrowly escape the suffocating embrace of the Shambling Mound, to outwit the wily Doppelganger only, at the last, to succumb to the mind sapping predations of the fiendishly evil Intellect Devourer.

This bunch, of course, are members of the Wargames Club and the monsters mentioned here are a tame sampling of the creatures participants might encounter in a game of Dungeons and Dragons. The club meets at 7pm every second Friday in the House of Lords and it is not unusual for the dice to be still rattling past daybreak. Warding off battle fatigue with caffeine, the dogged refusal to admit defeat or the eager anticipation of victory, the wargamers often do not get around to packing up their pieces until 7 or 8 in the morning.

According to Dave Sweeney, president of the club, the interest among the 20 or so active members is split between tactical war games such as Risk and Global War and the increasingly popular fantasy role playing games of which Dungeons and Dragons is the favourite (D and D to the avid). Past president Colin Hunt said the interest in the creation and re-enactment of battles with miniatures has subsided this year due to the graduation of many of the former combatants. Hunt who owns his own set of Napoleonic miniature said he still gets the occasional chance to relight the battle of Waterloo when some of the veterans, thirsting for battle, return to Queen's for a weekend foray.

The Wargames Club is no haven for the intellectually lazy, for many of the games demand attention to a myriad of factors as well as the willingness to spend up to an hour setting up a game, and win-or-lose, helping to put it away. (No small feat when there can be 2,500 pieces involved!) Most participants are serious about their academics giving them top priority, however one member admitted he enjoyed the games far more than his major, chemistry.

In a campaign game like Global War combatants must decide on priorities for war production, attempt to keep the war on one front, and maintain supply lines while being wary of sneak attacks. And the preparations for a 50 room dungeon for D and D can consume up to 20 hours. One fellow, who we will call Mr X (due to the conservative nature of the profession he is entering he prefers anonymity) designed a 15 floor fortress for D and D that took the better part of 3 months.

The popularity of D and D, the most often played game lies in its versatility and in its potential for imaginative involvement. The referee (who the players refer to as God because of his omnipotence) has control of the dungeon, which is a maze with hidden traps and monsters the players must surmount in order to reach the Treasure. Each of the players has a character one who might have risen in stature or power, perhaps to the level of Lord or Wizard, by surviving earlier games. D and D enthusiast Larry Middleton compares the game to life. "A good game is when you have enough money to supply your character with weapons." There are no final victories in D and D and it is not unusual to loose 2 or 3 characters in a game.

On a Friday night I was invited to watch a miniatures battle taking place on blanketed table tops (rolled up copies of the Journal providing topography) in a second floor room in McCorry. The miniatures, which were mostly recreations of ancient Greek and Roman soldiers, advanced relentlessly toward each other according to rolls of the dice. There were a few fantasy figures involved including crocodile and lizard men, as well as a lumbering Triceratops on one side and a ferocious horned chameleon on the other. When opposing forces met each other in melee casualties were calculated according to charts and dice.

Mr X who was present explained this was one of these battles "played for pure fun with no purpose beyond that."

The refreshing escape through imaginative participation these games offer is not unlike that offered by the recent spate of fantasy movies. Hollywood has released, although the games provide a more intense experience. Perhaps the coverage of businessmen interested in miniature which appeared in a recent Fortune represents a growing tolerance and acceptance of the imagination by the conservative forces in society. May be someday Mr. X can shed his anonymity and freely admit to this love for games.

SHAMBLING MOUND

Shambling mounds are associated with the game of dungeons and dragons. They are found in dismal marshes or certain wet subterranean places. They are omnivorous, feeding upon any living material (via their weird roots and tendrils). They attack fearlessly, grabbing with their limbs twice per melee round. If a shambler's attacks hit a single opponent, the victim is entangled and will be suffocated in the creature's slime.

A South American speaks out

we don't need charity

Castro Alves

South America is a continent that provides cheap raw materials, cheap labour, cheap industrialized products, cheap beef, cheap grains. In fact almost all of our resources are permanently - ON SALE!!

Yet, at the same time, the result of these bargains is the increased misery of the working people. Only 5% of Latin Americans - those who work as managers, as technicians, as landlords, and as watchdogs of multinational corporations - benefit from the people's effort.

The poor keep the rich, rich; and, at the same time, the rich keep the poor, poor. When you, as a student, see a North American magazine illustrating a poor little girl from South America, or Asia, you may feel sorry, and sometimes you may try to get some money to adopt one of these children. There are many programs which try to solve "the problem" by this means. Yet this is just another kind of exploitation of the poor.

There is much evidence to prove that despite your gifts, this does little or nothing to address the real problem. In fact, it may just serve to cover it over. Perhaps by understanding the social phenomena of poverty, by discovering its roots, we can see it more clearly and hence begin to solve it in a fundamental way.

The following is some data that could work as an indicator of the increase in social and economic exploitation in Brazil, despite large amounts of money being directed to programs ostensibly laid out to help the poor.

April 1st of 1964 in Brazil, the Army supported by the U.S.A. took over the elected presidency of Joao Goulart because the interests of big American Companies were in danger.

May of 1964, the new Military Government offered the country to the Foreign Investors and gave investment incentives, such as

1. exemption from income tax for 10 years;
2. exemption from importation tax for imported machinery;
3. free land for construction of factories;
4. protection by the State against the demands of the workers, i.e.
  - a) Trade unions controlled by the state;
  - b) the army providing a staff to control the workers in each factory in order to prevent strikes;
  - c) the International Monetary Fund (IMF) regulating salaries, (in other words, the salaries will never equal the inflation);
5. provision by the State of all infrastructure such as Hydro electric power, running water, roads, transportation, communication systems (benefits generally not provided to the majority of Brazilian people).

The result of these offers to Foreign Companies was the well known and internationally acclaimed Brazilian "economic miracle" in 1970-71 with a high index of economic growth.

Business Week, a magazine from the U.S.A., in 1977 showed that Brazil was the country that gave the best profits to Foreign Investors in its global survey.

But there is another side of the "economic miracle" - a dark side.

Repression, torture and death spread out to all sectors of society with the creation of a death squad;

- Censorship in the media increased;

- In 1970, 100,000 people were in exile and 20,000 in jail;

- Dismissal of social science professors and closure of their departments;

- Selling out of hospitals to private foreign companies (Blue Cross, etc.);

- Emigration of scientists, technicians and liberal professionals,

- Decrease in salary for the workers in Sao Paulo, the most important industrial centre,

- An increase in the infant mortality rate, from 62.9 per 1000, in 1960, to 89.5 per 1000 in 1970 (in Sao Paulo);

- Recognition by Fundacao Getulio Vargas (an official government organ) that 30,000,000 people live in extreme poverty in Brazil,

- Proclamation by Time magazine, September 11th, 1978, saying that in spite of a economic boom,

16,000,000 children were hopelessly deprived

Regardless of the fact that foreign investors and Multinational Corporations control everything in Brazil, the factories, the fields, the barracks, the media, the politics, education, the medicine, the sciences, they cannot control our history. This, as in Iran will belong to the poor, to the oppressed, to the exploited, because they are the majority of our population.

Nothing can destroy the desire of freedom that 100,000,000 people have in their heart. The oppressor has the profits and the machines but we are still alive in our desire for freedom and our struggle to realize our needs. We are awakening and the future belongs to us.

Therefor, rather than send a few dollars to "save a child" from a social and economic system that will remain to oppress him or her after the new shoes wear out, perhaps we must begin by asking what would happen if we demanded justice for the child and the child's home - not just charity!

Muddy Waters plays them

Mean ol' Blues

Dot Tuer

It was Saturday night in Grant Hall. Everyone wanted to boogie to the blues. Even Heaven's Radio wanted to play the blues. Fortunately, they relapsed into a more comfortable reggae style after a pale imitation of Muddy's "Good Morning Little School-Girl." But when Muddy himself shuffled onto stage to wail out "Mean Mistreater," the crowd knew this was no imitation. They gave the King of the Blues a welcoming standing ovation. With Pine Top Perkins perched over the piano, Willie "Big Eyes" Smith going crazy on drums, and the mouth-harp whooping and roaring over the tight instrumentals, Muddy Waters and his band gave us some of that Chicago-soul music, a bout of the real-live blues.

Beginning with some slow, piercing vocals, Muddy sang reflectively of the no-good women he had known. This was an older, wiser, Muddy, who conveyed in a lumbering, paternal style the music in his blood and the world he used to know. But upon introducing himself with the lyrics, "Muddy Waters, here I come," he came alive with an electrifying version of "Catfish

Cabinet Maker--Hugh Fisher

Janice Rahn

"Political Science, Psychology, English. I went through them all," says Hugh Fisher, a Queen's graduate. Then he tried janitorial and other odd jobs. One day someone saw a little table Hugh had made and said, "hey, that's nice. Could you make me one." That's where it all began. Now Hugh Fisher is showing a selection of his work at the Upper Edge Gallery, above the Canadian Shop.

There's a matching pine bed and chest, mirror and wardrobe. They are sturdy and savored with the warmth of hand-crafted wood. There is a market for handmade furniture and little competition, so Hugh has been able to work at it full-time at his own shop in Yarker. His work has become his life.

"Every morning, I eat my energy food, stoke the fire in the shop—it's next to the living room—and I work sometimes late into the evenings." Sounds more productive than watching television, I said. He agreed though the lady from the television who was filming Hugh for her afternoon show didn't. That's her business, but it is Hugh's to make furniture.

I asked him if he would like to study under a master. He feels that there are none around and he would have to go to the States where the best schools are. Since there is such a need for good craftsmen, I hope Hugh sees it as his role to perfect his skills and help fill the gap.

After four years of using only their heads, Queen's students should be able to appreciate Hugh's need to use his hands.

Blues." His face contorting and his fingers flying, he smiled as if to say, "man, with my music I'm younger than any of you."

From here on in Muddy had the audience in the palm of his hand. Pine-Top Perkins pounded out some Kansas City blues and Muddy played an incredible slide guitar. He snarled the blues, winced the blues, howled the blues, and infected the audience with the spirit in his music. Muddy wasn't just feeling the blues, he was the living incarnation of their essence, working the audience into a frenzy culminating with "Mannish Boy." Sliding off his stool, he lurched across the stage with Grant Hall cheering to every line of "now I'm a man, way past 21, I'm a Hoochie Coochie Man." Muddy was having a good time and we were all rocking along with him.

Then slipping off stage, he left a little bit of his soul still lingering. And that little bit of soul in all of us must have got Grant Hall's mojo working, for he returned for an unexpected encore. With a smile that creased his face into its 64 year-old wrinkles, he commanded a certain awe and respect. For the man who closed Saturday night with "Got My Mojo Working," is a man who can still belt out the hardest blues in the world to play. No one got a lot of Muddy, and perhaps some were disappointed that he only played for 45 minutes, but everyone got a taste of Muddy present, and a glimpse of Muddy past. But more than anything, everyone there got a moment with a man, who at 64, can still convey to an audience the energy and intensity that blues is all about. Man, we saw the granddaddy of the blues himself.

Wind Ensemble's final show

Jim Cookson

On Wednesday March 14, the Queen's Wind Ensemble, under the direction of Dr. Duane Bates, will perform its final on campus concert of this year.

The program will include works from the 16th century through the 20th century by such composers as Gabrieli, Stravinsky, Holst and Khachaturian. Also featured will be a new work for double wind ensemble which was composed by Bruce Pennycook, who joined the teaching staff at Harrison-LeCaine Hall this year.

The Wind Ensemble will be touring to Edmonton and Vancouver in two weeks as part of an exchange program with the University of Alberta, and there is still a considerable amount of money to be raised.

The Wind Ensemble would like the support of the students and staff at Queen's this Wednesday night and we're sure that you would find the concert to be most enjoyable. Admission to the concert is free and donations will be accepted at the door. Concert time is 8:30 PM at Grant Hall.

Record Reviews

Great Jazz Trio: At the Village Vanguard

McCoy Tyner: Supertrios
Paul Bley Trio: Japan Suite reviewed by Paul Adams

The evolution of the jazz trio of piano, bass and drums has come a long way since the days when this was merely a showcase for the piano player with his rhythm section. The collective interaction between members of the trio has matured in the seventies and the three albums reviewed here are ample evidence of this fact. These albums vary in their ties with the past, spanning the spectrum from blues to the free idiom and yet the integrated approach to improvisation is evident throughout these sides.

The Great Jazz Trio is indeed a supersession, gathering pianist Hank Jones, bassist Ron Carter and drummer Tony Williams at the Village Vanguard in New York City. Hank Jones is joined by one of the best bass-drums duos in jazz history, creating one of the finest trio recordings in the past few years.

Carter and Williams rose to the foreground in the legendary Miles Davis Quintet of the mid-sixties, whereas Jones, the prodigy of a musical family (brothers Thad and Elvin) has his roots more firmly grounded in the tradition. Together they swing through Charlie Parker's "Moose the Mooche", two blues tunes and the reflective Coltrane ballad "Naima".

The trio reaches its height during "Naima". Tony's cymbals are reminiscent of the way he sounded many miles ago. Carter's firm foundation and note-bending solos touch base with the tradition and yet resound with a complexity that sets him a step above his contemporaries.

This is certainly no single man's date, and my only wish would be that Jones had been more aggressive in joining the others in their many energetic dialogues.

McCoy Tyner rose to prominence as the pianist in the classic John Coltrane Quartet in the sixties, and the model extended approach of his mentor is apparent in every aspect of his playing. For this session, Tyner chose to record two discs with different trios.

The first album pairs the aforementioned Ron Carter and Tony Williams with Tyner, while on the second disc McCoy trades licks with bassist Eddie Gomez and drummer Jack DeJohnette.

Tyner's heavy-handed chording and explosive runs have characterized a style often imitated by younger musicians. His chordal clusters are most successful in the driving up tempo tunes of the first album, such as Coltrane's "Moment's Notice." Again the drumming of Williams is flawless and enlightens this session.

Spanning a range of composers that includes Duke Ellington, Thelonius Monk and the Brazilian Jobim, Tyner drifts effortlessly along the keyboard.

On the second disc, Tyner chooses two more traditional tunes and four originals. Gomez, in his first outing with Tyner, handles the melodic and rhythmic role of the bass in royal fashion. The clean, tuned drumming of DeJohnette fits admirably.

For an introduction to Tyner this two record set excels. But McCoy will soon need to pursue a new direction off the Coltrane trail if his creative fire is to continue to burn.

Record Reviews

Paul Bley is a Canadian expatriate whose trio represents the free improvisational facet of jazz. Bley sought out a more appreciative audience in Europe in the sixties and his Japan performance represents a reunion of his trio with Gary Peacock on bass and Barry Altschul on drums and percussion.

Altschul should really be classified as a percussionist because his textural weavings and polyrhythmic innovations add colouring to this open-ended performance. This is no foot tapping session and the action shifts from Bley's astral wanderings, through Peacock's iconoclastic bass lines to Altschul's percussion fireworks in rapid fire sequence. Peacock has the uncanny ability to sense a developing theme, extend it, and then toss the tune back to Bley for further reinforcement.

Bley's Japan Suite is a summation of the free piano trio experiments of the Sixties and the rejuvenated trio stands testimony to the viability of this approach in the seventies.

In summary we have the release of three of the most important piano trio records in the last few years; each paying homage to a different jazz idiom and yet all displaying the rewards of the triumvirate approach.

Swim Gaels faced nation's best

Larry Brawley

The CIAU swimming and diving championships recently held at Pointe Claire was a high performance meet with a standout competition in many events by CIAU champions and national team members.

Waterloo defeated Toronto and the University of Alberta to clinch the men's title.

This year's meet was one of the best in recent years as the depth of overall performances was much superior to past years. Swimming and diving at Canadian universities is finally closing the ability gap and performances are of Canadian national calibre.

The small contingent of Queen's swimmers fared exceptionally well at this meet with all swimming personal best times this season or lifetime bests.

The standout for Queen's was Don

Lawryniuk who grabbed the bronze medal in the finals of the 200m breaststroke. Veteran George Bovell finished his swimming career by taking the 200m freestyle out fast and holding off challenges by Toronto swimmers to win the consolation final. Freshmen Jack Raleigh also won the consolation final in the 1500m. The style swimming 29 seconds faster than his Bronze medal finish at the OUA Championships.

Perhaps the most pleasing event for Queen's men other than Lawryniuk's bronze, was the swim by the 400m freestyle team of George Bovell, John Lane, Jack Raleigh and Don Lawryniuk. Although they were not Queen's best freestyle team they swam a full 2 seconds faster than Queen's Bronze medal team at the OUA's and set a new team record.

Three Gals also compete at CIAU's

Diana Harrison

The weekend of March 1, 2, and 3 marked the end of the 1978-79 season for the women's swim team, as they competed in the C.I.A.U.'s. Carla Pepler, Cathy Masson and Diana Harrison represented Queen's in the final meet involving twenty-four universities from across the country.

The calibre of the competition was very high but many points were won as Cathy Masson placed a strong first in the consolation finals for the 100m backstroke with a time of 1:09.97 seconds. She also obtained points for placing third in the 200m backstroke consolation finals and just missed placing in the 100m butterfly event by one position.

Carla Pepler achieved a personal best for the year in the 100m freestyle and did extremely well in both the 200m and 100m breaststroke events, winning third and fourth positions respectively in the consolation finals.

Many thanks must be extended to Jane and Meriam, whose time and enthusiasm helped make this season a great one for the team.

Olympic debate unresolved

Kevin Whittaker

Last Thursday evening, Dupuis auditorium was packed to listen to a debate on the past, present and future of Canadian Olympic policy.

The question which was put to the five panelists was "Should Canada invest in Olympic gold medals?". Unfortunately, Lou Lefave, the Director of Sport Canada was unable to attend, due to a death in his immediate family. Replacing Lefave was Dr. Geoff Gowan, the Technical

Shoemaker qualifies for national X-C team

Donald Mac Kinnon

Queen's University's ace cross country runner, Adam Shoemaker will be off to Ireland in May as part of Canada's national cross country team. This past weekend, Shoemaker was the fifth best Canadian in a 12,000 metre qualifying race held at Bowling Green University in Ohio.

Shoemaker, who the previous week won the OUA indoor 5,000 metre championship, had to place in the top eight of fourteen Canadians running in the race.

As this is Adam's last year at Queen's this honour represents a tremendous finish to his career here

Director of the Canadian Coaching Association.

Gowan opened up the debate by stressing that Canada should strive for excellence in her Olympic endeavors. He went on to explain that the pursuit of excellence was inherent in human nature, and that excellence inspires others to participate.

Next to speak was Nick Auf Der Maur, Montreal City Councilman and journalist for the Star. Auf Der Maur, ever the politician, attacked the structure of the Olympic program while implicitly agreeing with the principle of the Games. He felt that we could get more by spending less, and concluded by saying that Canada cannot buy gold medals.

Richard Pound, the President of the Canadian Olympic Association, advanced an argument similar to Gowan's. He agreed that the average Canadian is inspired to participate in physical activity, by watching Canadian athletes in the Olympics.

Bruce Kidd was the first to diverge from the rather consensual position of the other panelists. Kidd an experienced orator, demanded that high performance sport should not be integrated in Canada until there is sport for all. Kidd, in a neo-Marxist fashion, outlined the degradation of sport in the advanced societies, using the production line metaphor quite well. He advocated a return to sport as an existential experience.

The opening comments were concluded by Richard Helmes, a sport sociologist from U of T. Helmes stepped outside of the entire framework of the Olympic program and placed sport within a larger social context. Helmes said that in light of the poverty, unemployment, and the quality of life for the 35% of Canadians living below the poverty line, the entire question of investing in gold medals was absurd. He did however, outline the type of program that he would like to see if there must be one. He proposed a system directed at the average person, involving recreative leisure type activities. He was in total opposition to the development of any elite programs.

These opening statements were followed by a relatively tame debate amongst the panelists. The issue really became heated during the question period. The audience proved themselves as efficient interrogators as each panelist was challenged to defend earlier generalizations. By the end of the question period, the argument became crystallized. The growing consensus was based on two unchallenged assumptions; 1) that it is inherent in human nature to strive for excellence, 2) that excellence in sport inspires the not so excellent to participate also.

The question period was drawing to an end, and the moderator, Hart Cantelon called for the last question when a rather dramatic event occurred. Richard Gruneau, a sociologist at Queen's stood up in the front row and walked to the front of the hall. He expressed his displeasure at the course which the debate had taken and attacked the unsupported assumptions which had been made concerning excellence and mass inspiration. Backed up by an arsenal of social facts and rhetorical skills, he systematically destroyed every one of the truisms which had been advanced that evening. This action was met with a healthy approval from the audience. The moderator invited responses from the panel and Auf Der Maur made a few comments which did not really address Gruneau's argument.

BEWS NEWS

Mark Pentland

Perhaps this issue of Bews News should be called Meds News! Meds had an outstanding week last week, claiming three Bews championships in as many days. On Tuesday, the Meds Bowling team of Doug Bell, Ken Edwards, Tom Higgins, and Dave Matheson defeated M.B.A. in the Bowling final. Meds then won the second game of the hockey championship on Wednesday, beating Commerce 79 in the best of three decision. Finally, on Thursday, the Basketball title was bestowed upon them, with a victory over Commerce 81. These three victories are icing on the cake for an outstanding year for the Meds unit. They will attain the highest finish in the Bews Standing ever for them, and much of that success is due to the excellent job done by Ken Appleby.

In other play off action Commerce 79 added another championship to their list with an overtime victory over Mining in the Broomball final last Thursday. The Curling title was claimed by M.B.A. in a close match with Mechanical. Waterpolo and Ball Hockey playoffs continue this week with both champions to be decided by Thursday.

Looking beyond the ghetto

No one has to tell Queen's students that finding a suitable house off-campus is very difficult indeed. It's a simple matter of supply and demand. Virtually every available place in immediate proximity to the University is sought after by more than one student or group of students, and invariably somebody is still looking for a future home at this time every year.

Part of this problem originates with the desire on the part of a majority of students to live in the "student ghetto" area. The advantages are obvious. One is within easy walking distance of campus, rents are cheap, and one most likely has student neighbours who do not complain about the noise and other factors commonly associated with student tenants.

However, the real problem resulting from this great demand for houses in the ghetto has been the strong bargaining position it gives to landlords who own houses there. Very few are inclined to make improvements to their houses when they know some student(s) will accept a house in any condition—just so long as they have somewhere to live. Moreover, the continuing state of disrepair in which most student houses are maintained has not curtailed landlords from raising rents every year.

So where does a solution lie to the problems of excess demand for houses in this area?

According to John Richardson, Queen's University Housing Director, the vacancy rate for Kingston as a whole has increased this year to 6%. With the normal rate of vacancy set at 3%, more rental units are available this year outside the ghetto than there have been in the past.

A quick glance through the Apartments Unfurnished section (most vacant rental units in Kingston are apartments) in a local newspaper showed that rents for three and four bedroom apartments listed under central, Queen Mary and the shopping center, or on/near the bus lines were comparable to those closer to Queen's, ranging from $220 to $275 per month for three bedroom and $325 to $380 for four bedroom. With Bus-It operational on all bus lines next year, transportation will be less trouble for any student choosing to live further away from campus.

The moral of this story is that if you have yet to find a house for next year—don't worry. Not only might you still find one in or near the ghetto, but there are more available places in Kingston at comparable prices that can be easily reached by public transport.

What did we miss?

Upon arriving at university, the perception of most students is that a new independence has been reached—an independence of judgement. It came as a surprise then that students are viewed as incapable of handling the more titillating scenes of a movie such as Emmanuelle.

Perhaps the Ontario Censorship Board should be commended for the manner in which it undertakes its protective responsibilities. Imagine one hundred students, away from the womb-like protectiveness of home and driven to frenzy by the naked romps of men and women on the silver screen. Surely mass hysteria would have broken out in Dunning Auditorium and led to a mad assault on Victoria Hall and Leonard Field.

Certainly the feelings of disappointment among the patrons were infinitely preferable to the insane sexuality that would have been evoked had most of the intimate scenes not been left on the cutting-room floor.

Such a situation evokes high school days when what was seen and read was consciously limited by those in authority. However, it seems ridiculous that university students, exposed as we were to an uncensored Mark Lane, cannot view the innocent sexuality of Emmanuelle.

Constables must enforce liquor laws at Stadium, Council rules

Deb MacLeod

AMS constables will be responsible for enforcing provincial liquor laws at Richardson Stadium next year, despite a motion to the contrary suggested at Outer Council meeting last Thursday night.

Constable policy for next year is to frisk students at the stadium gates and confiscate any liquor that is found. If a student refuses to co-operate, the constable will confiscate his or her student card to identification purposes. The offender will then be summoned to appear before the AMS Court.

Chief Constable Colin Carter said the constables hope students will acknowledge the laws and cooperate with their enforcement. He added, "Without this co-operation, the stadium will be difficult to police."

Peter Doody, a second-year law student, opposed the decision, saying, "I think it's the constables' role to enforce AMS regulations and to ensure things don't get out of hand at events. It's not their role to do the dirty work of the police." He added that if the constables crack down, antagonism between the force and the students will increase, weakening the constable system. He argued that police are far better qualified to handle the situation.

Doody also pointed out that under the present system, students can be charged twice for the same offense. An offender can be charged up to $300 by the AMS Court, as well as a $35 fine from the provincial courts for having liquor in a public place.

Fred Prinzen handles exam tension by weightlifting. Wise professors have noted this—he is expected to do very well.

Housing office director shifted

Doug Ronson

A major shake-up occurred in the University Housing Office last week as Director John Richardson was transferred to General Services.

While this move is generally believed to be the beginning of a major upheaval in the Housing Office, both Richardson and Dr. Jim Bennett, Administrative Assistant to Vice Principal Love, denied that this is the case.

Richardson said that he did not foresee any major changes in the operation of the department. Bennett concurred, but noted that "the new manager is bound to have different perspectives."

Bennett described Richardson's changes as a "lateral transfer." "He has the operation running reasonably smoothly and the move will provide us with an opportunity to use his talents more fully," he said.

Bennett also denied a rumour that a number of staff members at the Housing Office may request transfers to other departments. He met with the Office staff and maintenance people on Friday to discuss the issue and offered transfers to anyone who desired them.

"However, there was no indication at all that people want to move. They had some very constructive ideas and a great deal of enthusiasm," he said.

Bennett added the transfer was part of the university personnel development policy and that he would be assuming the Housing Director's responsibilities until a new one could be appointed.

Managers, Constable chosen

Appointees have been named to fill the positions of Pub Manager and Chief Constable for next year.

Jeff Beck, AMS Vice-President (Operations) announced the selections of Jim Stone as manager of Allie's, John Koopman as manager of the MacLaughlin Room, and Ken Beckett to serve as Chief Constable.

Beck stated that although he was impressed by many of the candidates and the ideas which they presented during the interviews, these 3 offered the most in experience and competence.

The appointments will come up for ratification before Outer Council at their next meeting.

Sweeney discusses the future for universities

Kim Fennell

John Sweeney, Liberal Critic for Colleges and Universities, spoke with Journal reporters while visiting Queen's last Friday. He had some comments on the future of post-secondary education in Ontario and the Minister responsible for it, Bette Stephenson.

Sweeney was asked for his opinions concerning the P.S. Ross report which recommended, among other things, that tuition fees be unpegged for universities across the province. He replied that while his party hasn't taken a firm stance yet, it is leaning towards a procedure whereby tuition would go up annually at the same rate that government grants would go up to universities (5% this year). "If they're going to go up it's better to do it on a small annual basis than wait every three or four years and increase it by $100."

Sweeney added that neither he nor his party agree with the suggestion that fees be unpegged from a provincial average and allow each school to set its own. He was concerned that the more established and powerful universities would be at a distinct advantage over schools like Trent and Brock.

Sweeney felt that Bette

Stephenson was "short-fused" and tended to "shoot from the hip." He said she doesn't have a broad range of experience in education and suggested that she become "much more aware of and much more sure of what in fact is going on before she makes the kind of statements that she's making."

Sweeney said he approved of the amalgamation of the Ministry of Education and Ministry of Colleges and Universities and stated that his party's position would be to give the system a try. He added that he had done some investigation into the matter throughout Canada and the U.S. and could find no evidence suggesting amalgamation was any less effective. He did not believe that this represented a government shift in priority away from colleges and universities but stated that a protection mechanism would have to be built into the system to prevent universities from being shunted off from the Minister's attention.

Concerning the future of university education in Ontario and the possibility of closures, Sweeney said he was "not prepared to see any such closures." He suggested a rationalization of faculties explaining that there were too many faculties of education in the province (10) and possibly an excess number of law and engineering schools.

Sweeney said "I don't think we can continue to use the total pot of money that we've got now and spread it as thinly as we've been doing. I'd like to see a more productive use of funds."

Sweeney expressed some concern over the shift by students towards more job-orientated programs like business.

"My fear is that the whole liberal arts type of education, which I think is pretty important in our society, will get shoved further and further into the background. I would want to build some kind of protection mechanism for it so that it doesn't get shoved so far back that it's impossible to recover."

Computer will capture meal card criminals

Deb MacLeod

A new computer system has recently been undergoing trials at all residence meal card checking lines. The system is designed to reduce the fraudulent use of meal cards, including invalid cards and passing cards around.

The decision to use the checking system was made by the Residence Board last year. Although it was to be implemented in September, 1978, there were a few "bugs" to be worked on. The system is in the final stages of testing and John Douglas, Saga Foods Director, says "it will be ready for sure next September." He added that the decision was made solely by the Residence Board with cooperation from Saga Foods.

The system, while keeping file on the use of each individual meal card, will also function in residence fee accounting and recording room bookings. Thus, a central computer will hold the information of each student's file.

When asked about the cost of the system, Douglas replied it was "in excess of $50,000." He said the savings from preventing meal card misuse will pay off the system in five years.

OFS attacks Ross Report on tuition fees

John Baktis

The recommendations of the P.S. Ross Report, if adopted by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, will have a detrimental effect on accessibility and equal opportunity to university education according to Miriam Edelson, OFS Chairperson.

In her visit to Queen's last week, part of a province-wide informational campaign, Edelson stressed the dangers of some of the Report's recommendations.

"If any recommendations of the P.S. Ross Report go through, they (the Government) would be kicking access goodbye," said Edelson. "What we (the OFS) are trying to do is stimulate the debate because if we don't respond, no one else is going to."

The P.S. Ross Report is a study of tuition and incidental fees commissioned by the Ministry in the summer of 1978. It was released in January of this year and proposed a series of alternative tuition schemes. The three major ideas in the report were:

- 1) Indexing tuition fees to the cost of education.
- 2) Allowing greater differentials between fees for different programmes.
- 3) An unpegging of tuition fees altogether.

The main concern with these recommendations, according to Edelson is that the fees would be set by a mechanical system, divorced from whether people can pay or not.

"They rely on automatic funding without regard to who can pay or who can't," said Edelson. "The Ross Report looked at fee increases rather than the question of access, which is the very thing this Government has boldly proclaimed a commitment to," she added.

By indexing tuition fees to the actual cost of education, increases in tuition levels would be tied to increases in the expenses of operating colleges and universities. In principle there is nothing wrong with this but according to an OFS Report, administrators and the Ministry have begun to look more seriously at students as a revenue base for funding the institutions.

If tuition fees rise 5%, as they will next year, for the next five years, the tuition for university would reach $956 for the 1984/85 term, according to the OFS Report. If tuition paid for 20% of the costs as several universities have proposed, the tuition for 1984/85 would be $1,384.

The possible adoption of the other proposals of the Ross Report would also result in higher tuition thereby limiting post-secondary education to a select few. One of the major problems with this is the fact that the Ministry has already revamped its student loan program and is not making anymore changes, according to Edelson. The Ministry will make its decision on a new tuition policy next November and the question arises whether OSAP will counteract the impact of higher tuition on enrollment.

Eco-Fair: Alternatives in lifestyles and energy

Janet Brick

Today's society is using resources inefficiently, and the quality of life is deteriorating as a result. This is the conviction of organizers who presented "Eco-Fair: A Festival of Alternatives" at the John Deutsch University Centre, Saturday.

Eco-Fair is an informal series of lectures, films, information booths and video-tape shows. This year's events were a success according to organizer Daphne Goring, with a turnout of approximately 1500.

The focus was on Energy, Lifestyles and Food and Agriculture, with five films and six to ten lectures on each area.

Energy displays offered alternatives to fossil-fuel heating, as well as conservation measures. Solar energy was the topic of several lectures and films. Woodstove displays attracted a lot of attention. Mr. Molleson, a Kingston resident, spoke for many observers when he said "You can read all the articles and books, but until you see it, you don't really know what it is all about."

Lecturer Stephan Graham, a consultant to the Federal Government, stressed that it is critical that alternatives be implemented as soon as possible. "We've extended ourselves to the point that resources can't support our demands." He says society must become "less mechanistic, more organic, based on local and community values."

Pat Cameron of Crossroads International says that their group is working to change lifestyles by promoting "global participation, global acceptance and global understanding". It does so through a volunteer program that works in third world countries.

Other Lifestyle groups, such as Bahai Faith and Dandelion Community were selling books on their philosophies and alternatives. Many local groups had set up displays to make the public aware of existing alternatives in the Kingston community: Kingston Area Recycling Team, Kingston Food Co-op, Cataraqui Conservation Authority and Elrond College, were among them.

Nutritionist Lorna Seaman says that "Change must be made in a grass-roots sort of way." Joining food co-ops and growing as much of your own food as possible are positive changes. She also urges that we "look at what is being forced upon us by the advertising of multi-national corporations."

AMS Court Rulings

Decided by the A.M.S. Court on Wednesday, March 14, 1979.

S. McIntyre: This decision concerns a proposed bylaw which at present has received first reading in the A.M.S. Outer Council. In Order that interested parties might have an opportunity to provide input into the decision, written submissions were received and an open hearing was held on March 14. At the hearing it became clear that there was confusion as to how this matter came before the Court. I understood that the bylaw had been referred to the Court pursuant to Article 6 section 2b of the A.M.S. Constitution which provides for an appeal from a ruling of the Speaker after first reading. The section reads as follows:

(2) Amendments, additions to existing Bylaws, or creation of new Bylaws may be made by the A.M.S. Outer Council after three successive readings at regular meetings of Outer Council as follows: a) First reading: Approval in principle after which the proposal shall be referred without debate to the Speaker

b) The Speaker shall accordingly rule on the proposal which may only be reversed upon appeal to the A.M.S. Court.

The assumption that Article 6 section 2b was the route by which the bylaw was brought before us was based on the timing of this referral (i.e. after first reading), and on the fact that the person who originally approached the Court, John Koopman, had provided us with a copy of the bylaw which was annotated with negative remarks. After listening to Mr. Koopman's explanation of the referral, which was echoed by others who had been present, it became clear that the Speaker had declined to make a ruling and that therefore this was not an appeal. It was suggested, and the Court accepts this suggestion, that the matter was referred under Bylaw 18, section 9 (a) (i) which states:

9. The Court shall exercise jurisdiction regarding: 9 (a) interpretation of the A.M.S. Constitution: (i) on the request of Outer Council as a reference to the Court;

The interpretation involved in this question relates generally to Article 1 of the A.M.S. Constitution and to whether this proposed bylaw comes within this Article and is thereby rendered constitutional. The question can be stated more specifically as: Does the Rights of Faculty Societies Bylaw conflict with the provisions of Article 1, section 5 of the A.M.S. Constitution and is it therefore unconstitutional?

The A.M.S., through its constitution, has set out a wide sphere of operation for itself, and has given itself wide powers to define how it should operate within that sphere. Two relevant sections of the Constitution which demonstrate this are found in Article 1:

4. The A.M.S. shall have control over all legitimate enterprises of a non-academic nature.

5. The Constitution of the A.M.S. shall take precedence over all other societies and student organizations to which members of the Society belong, unless otherwise specified in this Constitution and Bylaws.

According to the latter section the Societies and student organizations are bound by the A.M.S. Constitution and the six Articles of that Constitution cannot be superceded by the societies or student organizations. However the words "unless otherwise specified in this Constitution and Bylaws" give the A.M.S. the power to allow the Societies to take precedence over the A.M.S. Constitution.

For example, Article 1 Section 4, gives the A.M.S. control over all legitimate enterprises of a non-academic nature. If a Faculty Society purported to give themselves control of such an enterprise, the A.M.S. Constitution would take precedence and the Society would be unable to take control. If, however, the A.M.S. Constitution or Bylaws specifically authorized the Society to control that non-academic enterprise, this control would be valid because despite the provision of Article 1 Section 4 of the Constitution the control was "specified in this Constitution and Bylaws."

In the present situation, the proposed Bylaw before the Court sets out the rights of the Faculty Societies. This Court has found that there is nothing in Article 1 section 5 of the A.M.S. Constitution that precludes the A.M.S. from passing such a Bylaw. Even after the passage of such a Bylaw the A.M.S. Constitution will still take precedence over the Faculty Society except insofar as this Bylaw specifies otherwise.

The Court was concerned with the constitutionality of section 3 of the proposed Bylaw which reads:

3. This Bylaw shall be amended only by a referendum or by a general or annual meeting with advance notice having been given.

Article 6 Section 2 expressly provides for the procedure for amending Bylaws and that procedure is different from section 3 above. However, Article 6 section 2 provides that amendments may be made under the provisions of that section. It does not state that they shall be made according to those procedures. Article 6 section 2 would appear to contemplate alternate methods of amending Bylaws such as that set out in Section 3 of the proposed Bylaw. Therefore Section 3 is not unconstitutional.

The A.M.S. Constitution gives the A.M.S. a great deal of power and latitude to pass such Bylaws as it sees fit. The proposed Rights of Faculty Societies Bylaw falls within that power, but it must be remembered that this decision of the A.M.S. Court is based strictly on the constitutionality of the proposed Bylaw and we leave the debate on its merits to Outer Council.

The world in Brief

Sandi Arthurs

Chicago - A 29th body was discovered under the home of sex killer John Gacy. When arrested last December Gacy told police he had sexually molested and strangled 32 young men and boys in the past seven years. He told police 27 bodies were buried under his suburban home and 5 were dumped in nearby rivers. As well as the 29 bodies under his home, 2 more were fished out of rivers last year.

Ontario - The cost of jail is going up to $6/day next month for prisoners serving intermittent sentences on the weekends or for those who leave jail during the day to work and return each evening. The present cost is $5/day.

Ontario - Ontario's new Child Welfare Act will be in effect as of June 1. The bill increases the rights of children before the courts and provides for independent legal representation. Professionals who fail to report incidents of known child abuse will be fined. There will be a provincial registry for receiving reports on child abuse and the press will have access to court hearings.

Israel - A treaty between Egypt and Israeli is 2 steps closer to realization. Two crucial compromises of the pact were approved by the Israeli Cabinet last Wednesday. It has been reported that an overwhelming majority of the Knesset is expected to approve the draft of the treaty.

Victoria - Three and a half year old Kimberly Vis fell into a ditch on February 7th and was under the water for between 15-30 minutes before a neighbor pulled her out. When Kimberly's heart began to function again and she was able to breathe with the aid of a respirator the doctors feared severe brain damage if she survived. Kimberly is now alert and speaking with apparently no damage to her memory, personality or brain function. The doctors considered the incident to be nothing short of a miracle.

Toronto - Toronto businessman Richard Kelleher, 45, was given a two year sentence for possession of 540 pounds of marijuana for the purpose of trafficking. The seizure was one of the largest ever in the Judicial District of York, and Crown Counsel Marlene Thomas asked the court for a sentence no shorter than 5 years. However, as Kelleher is a father of seven and this is his first offence the sentence was shortened.

Guelph - A solar energy refrigerator designed and built at the University of Guelph will be assembled on the tropical island of St. Lucia next month. Engineering Professor Frank Theakston developed the plans for the low-cost unit after being commissioned by the Guelph Rotary Club.

Ontario - An Ontario Supreme Court judge issued an injunction March 11th stopping CTV Television Network Ltd. from broadcasting an interview with Margaret Trudeau. Mr. Justice David Henry said the injunction will be in effect until the case is settled in court or until April 22 - one week prior to the planned publication date of Mrs. Trudeau's book, 'Beyond Reason' - (Oh Fuddle Duddle!)

Journal stomps GW in one-sided victory

John Koopman

The Golden Words once again tasted the agony of defeat in the Third Annual Queen's Journal-Golden Words hockey game.

The awesome Journal Juggernauts made it three in a row as they stomped the Words 7-5. The Journal squad was inspired by Beth 'the ripper' McKenzie who left the GW boys gasping.

Timmy Drydenwood played a tight game between the pipes for the Journal as he proved more than a match for the GW sharpshooters (when he wasn't sleeping). Baa-Baa Bakis was particularly conspicuous as he scored at will (with several furry creatures) throughout the contest.

Following the lead of Chris 'look I scored!' Hall, the Journal squad had the Golden Wimps thoroughly intimidated. The winning goal was scored by Tiger Tank Lavictoire, immediately subsequent to a firm right to the jaws which he graciously presented to a shell-shocked GW netminder.

The GW boys must be commended for a valiant effort but they were clearly playing out of their league.

Their skating ability left many of the spectators at Jock Hart's wondering who invited the Maple Leafs. Their play left one perplexed history major wondering if he was watching a rerun of Custer's last stand. GW Editor Graham Bate suffered the misfortune of repeatedly being mistaken for Harold Ballard by egg throwing spectators. Always a gracious loser, Bate acknowledged that being second to the Journal was no major embarrassment.

Other Journal notables in the game included Fudgie, Eggplant, Ern, Queer Bunny, Droop the Transfusion, (Samurai Harry) and Jane "flat on my ass" Gurr.

Support for Inco strikers at Queen's

Michelle Meyer

An organizational meeting of the Students Supporting Steelworkers 6500 (S.S.S.) was held on Saturday, March 17. The committee has been formed in response to the Kingston labour Council's resolution to organize a support rally and fund raising event for the 11,000 striking INCO workers in Sudbury.

The rally, to be held on Saturday, March 31, will also focus upon labour's right to strike in light of the recent actions of the Liberal government to curb the right to strike of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW).

The S.S.S. has allied with both Queen's staff and faculty in an attempt to raise a minimum of $1,000 to help the families of the INCO workers who have been subsisting on $25-$30 a week during the six month strike. The S.S.S. is planning to have fund raising booths set up and door collections in MacCorry Hall, the Douglas Library and the John Deutsch Centre on March 28 and 29.

In general, there has been wide popular support for the INCO strike because of the company's recent layoffs and their policy of diverting investment into underdeveloped regions where workers are not unionized and paid very low wages.

Soap Box

Anti-abortionists offer few options

Rob Reynolds

Late night movies are generally intended for insomniacs, fanatics and procrastinators. Occasionally however, this captive audience is treated to a flick that has a somewhat deeper meaning than the victory of cowboys over Indians, Americans over Nazis or God-fearing citizens over pagan motorcycle gangs.

During Reading Week there was such a film about a woman who attended a private woman's college in New England and became pregnant - on her first sexual encounter. To get an abortion she sought out a stereotyped "back room butcher". In the end the young woman passed away of internal hemorrhaging; not unusual when first year medical students perform operations in a warehouse.

Although this 1950's scenario seems out of date there is a worthwhile lesson to be learned. If abortion were made more difficult to obtain, women would have to seek the assistance of those unqualified butchers operating under unsanitary and unsafe conditions. In short, they would be laying their lives on the line to obtain something that is presently provided for in Canada's Criminal Code.

John Sweeney MPP for Kitchener-Wilmot, who was at Queen's last week, agreed the matter was a "trade-off". A trade-off indeed. For someone who professes to be "pro-life" in the broadest sense of the word that is quite a euphemism. By declaring that abortion should be harder to obtain Sweeney is threatening to endanger the lives of women who find themselves unable or unwilling to continue their pregnancy.

Exploiting history?

The Editor,

The article "Islamic Women Enjoy Full Equality", expresses concern
March 2nd. This view is understandable. I become bothered, however, by statements such as the following: "It seems that the Western world is attempting to forget its previous anti-Jewish behaviour by outlining its prejudices against the Islamic religion. Unfortunately, Muslims have not yet been able to make good use of this in the same way that Jews did and are still doing."

The suggestion that the Jews use anti-semitism as a "tool" is one that I find particularly disturbing, in view of the history of oppression against the Jewish people. Such statements not only tend to reveal the writer's

Ultimate in soft sell

Gil Gross

"Who will buy my wares? Shiny airplanes, beautiful thanks - only a barrel apiece! Who will buy?" So sang the peddler, as he walked slowly down the street, nodding his weathered face from side to side. He was tired - tired and thirsty, for he had come all the way from America, and now he thirsted for a taste of oil from the famous Saudi Wells.

He realized that his chances of getting that coveted sip were fair at best, for he had recently angered the local folk. He had encouraged two of their neighbors to bury their differences and end their ancient feud, thus depriving the vicinity of its sole distraction, its only guaranteed entertainment on a quiet Saturday night.

Why had this lowly outsider interfered in their affairs? Why had he upset the routine which they had become so accustomed to? Those were the people's thoughts as they barred their shutters and locked their gates in the peddler's face. His song appealed to them, taunted them to abandon their hostile ways and adopt a life of harmony. And yet, they did not trust him; after all, were not the wares he was peddling designed for violence and aggression? Was he not offering to help them ward off the great Red Devil? They shut their ears to his pleading voice, and went about their business.

The peddler, meanwhile, had thoughts of his own. He knew that his words of reason and his shiny toys had a powerful effect on the people. He sensed that there was a movement afoot to have him thrown out of town, or even - Heaven forbid - to deny him the drink he craved for. Though he knew the townspeople and their mischievous ways well, he also believed that they had the capacity for acceptance and compromise which, in a way, were also in his bag of merchandise. Some of the people were known to him as rabble-rousers; he knew they would do everything in their power to upset the delicate balance which he had so carefully and lovingly established between those two neighbors.

As dusk fell, the peddler, still pulling his little wagon, had sold nothing; he was as thirsty as ever. He knew that somehow, someday, his efforts would be appreciated and rewarded. The biggest reward he could conceive of would be to get all the people to accept each other as they were, to get them to work together towards a common goal. So, tired but patient and not yet despairing, he prepared for another cold and lonely night which he knew would be followed by another day of hard work and many disappointments.

Simple reason for oversight

The Editor,

On behalf of the Queen's Progressive Conservative Association, I feel it is necessary to qualify the comment made by Dr. John Coleman (Liberal nomination candidate-Kingston and the Islands) concerning Joe Clark which appeared in the March 13 Journal.

If Dr. Coleman had examined the facts more carefully, he would have discovered that the explanation for Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed's decision not to consider Mr. Clark as "possible cabinet material" was because Mr. Clarke never held a seat in the provincial legislature.

While Dr. Coleman has indeed a long list of accomplishments to his credit, it would perhaps be wise to suggest that in future he check his facts more carefully before making such observations.

Tunnel vision with profit at end; Noranda as accessory to terror

The Editor,

Since 1976 Canada's Noranda Mines have had the green light from the government of Chile to extract and develop the "Andacollo" copper resource in the province of Coquimbo. The planned investment by Noranda is estimated at a minimum of 350 million dollars. On Mar. 31, 1979, Noranda is planning to announce whether or not it will follow through on this project. This decision by Noranda will have ramifications for both Canadians and Chileans.

Canada has consistently condemned the abuse of human rights under the military junta of General Augusto Pinochet. The Pinochet government after coming into power via the assassination of a democratically elected leader and the estimated slaughter of 30,000 people and forcing an estimated half million more into exile rightfully fearing for their safety, has continued to use the most horrifying terrorist means in maintaining their power and literally trying to obliterate all suspected opposition. A nation that has a long and distinguished history of democratic rule has been reduced to the crassest form of totalitarianism, analogous to rule under Idi Amin, Franco or Adolf Hitler.

Does Canada desire to invest in such a situation, particularly when we know that investment serves to strengthen the existing regime? The world-wide ramifications for all Canadians are rather obvious. We would appear internationally as hypocrites, condemning atrocities on the one hand and feeding the source of the cancer with our investments on the other. No one really doubts at this stage in time that any Chilean benefits derived from the development of Andacollo would be appropriated by the ruling junta to be disposed of at their pleasure. To date they have been much more anxious to purchase military equipment to make their stranglehold on power in Chile beyond challenge than to invest in dealing with the nation's devastating poverty or infant mortality rate.

The Inco experience should have taught Canadians that multinationals should be encouraged to invest their resources at home and not spend money derived from Canadian natural resources and deferred taxes (86 million in Noranda's case) and incentive gifts of millions from federal budgets on foreign investment from which neither Canadians nor Chileans derive any substantial benefits. The fact that Inco has made massive layoffs in Sudbury and has not been overly anxious to settle the present strike, appears as a gloomy forecast of what Canadian workers can expect from multinationals who find more lucrative investments elsewhere. Investments albeit created by the exploitation of cheap labour forces with their rights to strike removed by governments similar to Pinochet's.

The advantages to Noranda of investing in a country like Chile are obvious: 1) Cheap labour and no labour problems for a start (trade unions are banned in Chile). 2) Abundant natural resources. 3) Political stability (at the cost of political repression and an abrogation of human rights). 4) A government that encourages development by foreign investment and ownership because of its own need for powerful allies and economic resources (i.e. a trading partner and working capital). But these business advantages are bought at the cost of supporting a corrupt and cruel regime of terror and no one can doubt that such support becomes a political form of repression by Noranda and implicates Canadians as Imperialists and oppressors, a role that most of us have trouble seeing ourselves cast in. Canadians have been silent on these issues too long.

So many of the articles and columns that run in university newspapers deal with world and national affairs, yet it is questionable if this is what university students want to read. People who write this kind of material, as aspiring journalists, do so because they believe it is important, but then I'm quite certain that the students who don't read this kind of material also think it's important—they would rather just read light, easy to ready articles about matters that directly concern them.

Although I'm aspiring to be a journalist, I'm also a political studies major who uses up all his fervor over world and national affairs for marks in essays. My behaviour justified, I feel that I can be trivial and write in this column about things that amuse me—like the fine art of being "preppie".

Gone are the days of the painter pants and rugged shirts. Today's prep is far more sophisticated. As we move away from the age of the T-shirt (only worn now with shirts over them) and jeans, we see that preppiness has taken on a whole new look. The proper appearance seems to involve a curious blend of casual/sloppy and dressiness/expensive.

Any clothing related to an expensive, elite sport is good. Tennis, golf, sailing and skiing clothes, in tasteful quantities, will help you on the road to being a prep. K-way jackets with a zipper half way down the front (all you jackets, sweaters and shells are best if they have to be pulled over your head) will help give you the sporty look that a true prep needs. It should be noted however, that since K-way is a Canadian company, it won't be in a true American north-eastern prep tradition.

The rumpled look is also pretty popular. Cotton clothes just like the kind Mom used to hate have taken on a new vitality since they don't have to be ironed. They are to be worn wrinkled.

Multiple layers of clothing are also big. Not only does it look good, you get to wash your clothes more often. One big point that some have not noticed yet, however, is that collars should be kept inside your sweaters. This makes it look like you've got a button down collar (if you aren't preppie enough to have some already).

Straight legged pants are also fairly vital if you are going to lead a well-adjusted social life. Pleats are, of course, optional, but if you're a purist, you'll forget them unless you plan to frequent the "disco scene" (the distastefully writes).

And, in case you haven't noticed, colours must be drab. Gone are the distasteful days of bright colours that made millions for the soap companies that sell cold water detergent. Browns, greys, khakis and whites are pretty important colours on campuses these days, perhaps a cultural backlash of closer relations with Russia and China.

However, the true prep must have some dressier clothes to mix with his or her stylishly casual clothes. And if you thought it was expensive to dress like a refugee, you should see what it costs for dressier clothes. Anything made of tweed is bound to be successful, but sports jackets are particularly popular. You can, of course, buy a used jacket from the Salvation Army, and this will be quite acceptable. However, I often wonder about the morality of university students buying clothing intended for disadvantaged people, so that they can appear stylish. Also popular with preps is the chastising of fathers for throwing out their old narrow ties, since they are back in style again.

My editor also tells me that it is desirable to wear boxer shorts, but then he went to a preparatory school in the States and wears Bean boots and Toppers.

And, as for the real world, yes, I think that the artificial tariff barrier for Ontario wineries that is being created by this spring's LCBO price hike for imported wines is deplorable.

censorship today:

What you don't see can hurt you

Mark Henderson

Early last April, Paramount Pictures submitted the film Pretty Baby to the Ontario Censor Board for classification. To the surprise and outrage of many, the film, detailing the life in a New Orleans brothel as seen through a young girl's eyes was banned outright with no option for appeal.

explicit depictions of sex or violence really so powerful and dangerous as the government would have us believe?

Although films have been banned or cut on the grounds that certain scenes contain morally reprehensible material, there has never been a clear definition given to the terms used to denounce such film content. It seems the cinema, the same basic myths remain. One sexologist has stated, "The convention which regards the sexual organs as shameful is without foundation in reason...sexual pleasure is just as admissible as any other natural satisfaction, and its exercise...has nothing to do with the morality, the virtue, or the dignity of either sex." This viewpoint clashes violently with the moralistic attitudes originating from a repressive, old, and outdated social order.

Attempts to clarify whether sexually explicit films, books, etc. are harmful, reveal that certain official interests are involved in perpetuating outdated and illogical attitudes about social morality.

The American Presidential Committee on Obscenity and Pornography prepared a report in 1970 which surprisingly called for the repeal of censorship at all levels of production, distribution, and marketing of sexually explicit material.

They found no connection between the exposure of adults and juveniles to explicit material, and the encouragement of delinquency, anti-social acts, character disorder and deviations. Sexual arousal seemed to be the only "side effect".

The committee concluded that "Governmental regulation of moral choice can deprive the individual of responsibility for personal decision which is essential to the formation of genuine moral standards. Such regulations would also tend to establish an official moral orthodoxy contrary to our most fundamental constitutional traditions."

Had the report been accepted and instituted by the White House, a virtual revolution in official social standards and attitudes would have occurred. Film makers would no longer have had to compromise by toning down or de-emphasizing sexual material in order to gain official acceptance. Thus artistic right to self-expression would have been liberated.

President Richard Nixon denounced the report however, for its "morally bankrupt conclusions", stating that "pornography can corrupt and poison the well-springs of American and Western culture".

Despite his condemnation, the effect of the report was to allow the censors to permit more explicit material into the broader categories of classification. This brief hiatus from official repression was terminated in 1973 when Nixon's supreme court broadened the obscenity concept, allowing local communities to judge what was or was not obscene.

The situation in effect today is becoming increasingly strict. Censorship is only the tip of the iceberg, so to speak, a reaction to the challenging of government authority and to the power to tell the public what is good or bad for their moral conscience. The whole concept of constitutional democracy has been thrown into serious doubt. Public guardians are becoming state organs for the "official line".

The implications of governmentally sanctioned censorship have negative effects on the serious film maker attempting to treat controversial subjects with honesty and candor. Movies are expensive to make and if a financier feels his investment may run afoul of the censors, his willingness to back a project is seriously handicapped.

The question does not merely concern itself with the exhibition and effect of sexually explicit, politically radical topics or so-called taboo subjects such as deviancy, death or homosexuality. It also concerns the right of democratically elected bodies to pass judgement for us in the name of order, responsibility and good taste.

Censor boards have constantly claimed that film is a more powerfully persuasive medium than literature or theatre and that the exhibition of controversial movies may warp our minds and undermine our values! In whose interest is it to repress such material? How can watching the act of intercourse breed depravity and unhealthy drives?

The whole concept of sexuality in our society must be examined in order to come to some conclusion about its supposed dangers, as the contradictions and inconsistencies on which present standards are based are truly frightening.

Forcing the subject of graphic depiction of sex in the cinema into the realm of stag films, hardcore features, cheap comedy and avant-garde experimentation is no solution. Keeping sexuality out of view or "under the counter" is the really unhealthy aspect of censorship.

The banning and mutilation of serious films like Sweet Movie and

W.R.: Mysteries of the Organism, the explicit Deep Throat, and the intelligently crafted Pretty Baby and Empire of the Senses are outright acts of repression, an infringement on our basic rights as individual citizens and thinking human beings.

A less overt but equally significant aspect of censorship is the economic ramifications it entails. If a film maker refuses to make cuts or alterations to his product, his or her reputation with producers and financiers will be severely hampered. Large American-based film companies striving for the widest market possible, tend to make films with "soft" topics, bland entertainment which will offend as few people as possible and return large profits.

Working closely with the censorship and classification boards, pressure is often used to make artists conform to a conservatively based moral ethic, regardless of that person's intentions or beliefs.

Outspoken film makers are forced out of the mainstream of the industry, making it extremely difficult to find outlets for their work in order to recoup production costs. The effects of censorship and classification urges the industry to align itself with the government who sanctions the censor board, while the rights of large portions of the population to be exposed to all films are virtually ignored. Only codes of behaviour and conduct acceptable to the state are permissible in the majority of films released on a wide scale.

Speaking out against this coercion between the censor board and the Hollywood industry is Stephen Farber, a young critic who actually worked for the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) several years ago.

In the United States a film will rarely be banned, but will be snipped or pushed into the X category. An X virtually guarantees that most theatres will refuse to screen the film, and many large studios will not produce a script that may be "awarded" an X. Farber accuses the MPAA of having "little regard for the democratic process" and of upholding attitudes emanating from the Catholic Church. Their influence goes back to the beginning of cinema.

In 1934 the Catholic Church formed the Legion of Decency, a body which "kept an eye on movie morals". Its power was so great that, until the early 1960's a movie rated "Condemned" had no chance of turning a profit. The film industry had no choice but to cooperate closely with the Legion. The Production Code Administration, Hollywood's body for self-regulation, was also composed largely of Catholics and it made sure that no morally objectionable material would reach the screen and incur the wrath of the Legion.

Although these bodies have little effect today, the present MPAA still listens to the church as a guide for setting the specifications for the classification categories. Farber became totally disillusioned during his experience with the MPAA and condemned its intentions, practice and usefulness entirely. "The rating system that exists in America today is tied to the past, still dominated by the assumptions of men who grew up in a period of guilt and inhibition, and completely unresponsive to the audience for films. In a world as dynamic, as volatile as ours, film must be granted the freedom to keep abreast of social and intellectual change, the opportunity to experiment boldly and radically, only in this way will contemporary film artists discover the challenging imaginative truths that may help illuminate our lives."

The censorship practiced in Ontario is unfortunately even more oppressive than the archaic method of classification in the U.S.; if a film is submitted which exceeds the specification outlined for the Restricted category, the censor's scissors delete the objectionable material or the film is banned outright.

As Pretty Baby has made clear this applies to the theme as well as to the explicitness of sex or violence. Thematic repression is much more disturbing, for nudity and violence are easily detectable. But what criteria are used for the content of films, especially content which doesn't concern sex?

A scene from "W.R. Mysteries of the Organism". This film, which attacked the political and ideological roots of puritanical morality, was banned in Ontario.

Don Simms, a former CBC employee who replaced his more lenient predecessor O.J. Silverthorn in 1974, has taken a very narrow minded approach to his new job. Not only does his position require him to censor and classify films, the Ontario Censor Board is also responsible for population whose values are not shared by the public at large. The manipulation of our freedom is ultimately a political act which applies perjorative terms like "pornography" and "obscenity" to acts of intimacy and love.

One critic has suggested that the depictions of the orgasm "is particularly threatening to the bourgeois and the censorious for it is disruptive and anarchic. Such destruction of all bonds of logic and citizenship is a dangerous pleasure to be tolerated at best, it is certainly not to be freely displayed in public."

The argument for censorship is totally ridiculous and illogical, as well as an acute reflection of the repressiveness of our society. The public, the film maker, and the film industry itself suffers because of it.

For the benefit of all concerned the practice of censorship should be abolished and film classification should be completely re-evaluated. We can't really call our country democratic unless the freedom it stands for is given the opportunity to be exercised.

What mode of reasoning will allow films of incredible violence and brutality to be classified as adult entertainment while the exposure of genitals and breasts is considered as suitable for adults only? If this is considered logical, then I contend that there is a sickness in our cultural attitudes that must be removed. We can only hide ourselves from reality for so long.

"Six Characters" opens tonight in Con. Hall

Who is Pirandello?

"Plays don't make people.

People make plays."--L. Pirandello

Julian Cunningham - with thanks to John di Pietro

Ever since the appalling moment in Oedipus Rex, when the king discovered that the woman with whom he had been sleeping for several years, the woman who had bore him two children, was actually his mother, incest has become a predominant leitmotif of a drama spanning over two millennia, from Sophocles, to Pirandello, and finally to The Edge of Night. It has been immortalized, abused, and slaughtered by various writers.

On May 10, 1921, in Rome, Italy, Luigi Pirandello's treatment of incest in Six Characters in Search of an Author, incited a riot. The audience stormed the stage, engaging the actors in an all-out brawl. Even the critics joined in... Sensational! A reaction comparable only to that of the Abbey Theatre patrons of the same period in Dublin. Actors in the plays of Synge and O'Casey were left in no doubt about their audience's sentiments... catcalls and rotten tomatoes in the face.

In both cases, the audiences were revoking what the playwrights had shown them—a crystal clear reflection of themselves.

Only time brought understanding. And in Pirandello's case, understanding came when the great French director, Georges Pitoëff, mounted his Paris production of Six Characters in 1923. In his hands, the six characters became visitors from another reality, transported onto the stage in an old elevator cage through a tenuous green light.

From there, Six Characters took flight, rapidly becoming the cornerstone for the modern pessimist theatre of Jean Genet, Albert Camus and Jean-Paul Sartre.

Reality [the director] challenges illusion [the stepdaughter].

The origin of Six Characters is every bit as remarkable as the play itself.

Luigi Pirandello's wife was the product of maniacally strict and suspicious parents. Their paranoia embedded within her mind. Her sanity was a time bomb against which Pirandello's compassion was powerless. In 1917, time ran out. She lashed out at Pirandello, accusing him of an incestuous relationship with their own daughter. The daughter left, vowing never to return. Pirandello's wife, now completely shattered, spent the rest of her life in an asylum.

The only source of hope through which to exorcise the nagging images that lingered in Pirandello's memory, was his pen. So he distorted the events of 1917, and tried to give his characters a play. But they would not conform to a conventional dramatic recipe. Pirandello was forced, finally, to leave his characters (who now numbered six) suspended in the attitudes and conditions which destroyed them. They were locked into a fruitless, eternal search for salvation and understanding.

Six Characters in Search of an Author A Play within a play within a play within a rehearsal. To understand it is to see it.

It has attracted some of the most imaginative directors of this century, who can never agree upon exactly how to stage a play that refuses to admit that it is a play. Jean Beaufort

The leading lady wants a piece of the incestuous action.

Guthrie's interpretation got another sort of response eight years later when Six Characters was performed at the Martinique Theatre in New York.

"William Bell has staged it with imagination and without the recourse to the farcical excesses which I thought spoiled Tyrone Guthrie's version at the Phoenix a few years ago" (Richard Watts).

While the Queen's Drama Dept. isn't anticipating a riot at tonight's opening of Six Characters in Convocation Hall, one can expect to be engulfed in all the factors that make a damn fine drama, brilliant characterizations, suspense, laughter, and a certain lingering thoughtfulness that accompanies any truly great dramatist.

Six Characters in Search of an Author Tonight through Saturday in Convocation Hall (Old Arts Building). Curtain time 8:30. Tickets and information: Queen's Drama Dept. (547-6291).

Editor's Note: The headline above is the same one that appeared in the New York Times, Nov. 5, 1922. The question still needs answering today, especially in Canada where Pirandello remains largely unknown as an important dramatist.

Baldry coming back

Brent Lavictore

Long John Baldry brings his good time boogie-woogie music to the Jock Hartly Arena this Wednesday for a promised returned engagement. Most will remember the incredible performance Baldry and band gave at the Underground last term, a rare spectacle of energy in these days of glitter rock and roll.

The list of bands long John has played in and the people who have played for him reads like a Who's Who of rock music. Baldry discovered Rod Stewart singing in a London subway station, most of the original Rolling Stones used to collect at his apartment to jam and listen to American blues record (an event which led to the eventual rift between Baldry and the Stones since, import blues records being a rare commodity in England at the time, some of them forgot to return their borrowed records) and Elton John, then Reginald Dwight, cut his eye teeth with John. Hard to imagine, but true, back in the very early sixties an unknown group called the Beatles used to perform the intermission set for Baldry's club appearances.

Long John Baldry will again have with him vocalist Kathi McDonald, Pianist Roy Young, guitarist Mick Clark, bassist James Lee Fish and drummer Paul Brown Jr. Having just released a long awaited new album (see Record Reviews next week) we can expect to hear some new material, including their soaring version of "You've Lost that Lovin' Feeling", on Wednesday as well as some of his classics like "Don't Try to Lay no Boogie-Woogie on the King of Rock and Roll" and "Black Girl".

Hopefully, Roy Young will try to "shake the place apart" again with a "solo" set.

The intensity of Baldry's performance last term will be hard to match in Jock Hartly but if anyone can strike up an atmosphere of rock and roll intimacy, an occurrence not generally available since the days when the Rolling Stones were doing clubs, Long John Baldry can; after all, he's the King of Rock and Roll in its purest form.

La Parente: a cultural experience

French Canadian folk

S Jordan

On Friday, La Parente presented a varied program of songs and dances to a receptive audience in the Skylight Dining Room.

The people of Quebec have not forgotten their heritage. The traditional songs and dances are being preserved by groups such as La Parente, an ensemble of students from Laval University in Quebec City.

Costumed in early French Canadian dress, members of La Parente first performed, then invited the spectators to participate in learning the folk dances.

The group was sponsored by the Queen's-Laval Twin University Committee (new to Queen's this year), operating through the External Affairs division of the A.M.S. The main goal of the committee is to promote cultural exchange between the two universities. Next year more exchanges will take place, with groups like La Parente bringing new cultural experiences to Queen's.

Ensembles in concert

Special

On Friday March 23 in Grant Hall at 8:30pm the Music Department at Queen's will present a concert which features separate performances by two of its large ensembles Queen's Chamber Orchestra, directed by Dezzo Vaghy will perform the first half of the program and Queen's Choral Ensemble under Denise Narcisse-Mair after the intermission.

The Chamber Orchestra program consists of two works. Vivaldi's well-known "Concerto Grosso in A Minor", featuring soloists Alanna Deptuch and Geoffrey Somers, violins, and Alex Adaman, cello. This will be followed by what is perhaps one of the most famous of orchestral pieces, Smetana's "The Moldau" which depicts the course of the famous Moldau river through Bohemia from its source in the depths of the forest to Sumava, through the forest where a hunt is in progress; then through grassy plains where a rural wedding is being celebrated; through moonlit woods where fairies are disporting on its banks; then over the tumultuous rapids of St. John to where it finally reaches its greatest breadth at Prague.

The twenty-voice Choral Ensemble's Cantata group will sing Buxtehude's "In Dulci Jubilo" accompanied by a string trio: Caroline Smith and Jennifer Law, violins, and Heather Hay, cello. Perhaps the highlight of the Choral Ensemble's program is the combination of the full one hundred and twenty voice Ensemble with a Rock group consisting of piano, bass guitar and drums and a brass section of trumpets, saxophones and trombones in a performance of "In the Beginning of Creation" (A Rock Cantata). Just as Joseph Haydn in 1798 scored his work "The Creation", taken from the text of the Book of Genesis, in the musical idiom of his day, so Bobrowitz and Porter have adapted the same text and set it in one of the popular idioms of today in a wide range of styles which ranges from slow Rock blues to fast driving Rock.

The concert is admission free, but donations at the door will be very acceptable.

1984 is close at hand with Body Snatchers

Mark Henderson

Situated at the heart of our culture's ideology is the notion of the individual, and the sacred and cherished belief in one's right to self-expression and determination. Whether or not individualism is a viable reality in this day and age is a constant subject of argument, but its appeal as an abstract Romantic concept is beyond doubt. Mass conformity and lack of choice are the enemies of the individualist and when a confrontation is inevitable the battle must be fought down to the last person.

The Invasion of the Body Snatchers exploits this clash of ideas and ideologies within the realm of science fiction, and the result is a fairly engrossing, intelligent horror-thriller. Donald Sutherland, Brooke Adams, and Leonard Nimoy are all convincing in the lead roles, but they take a subordinate place to the photography and special effects. Set in San Francisco, this famous city is transformed into a nightmarish vision of paranoia and psychological terror.

Based on a novel by Jack Finney, The Invasion of the Body Snatchers was originally filmed in 1956 and directed by Don Siegel, as a low-budget effort that has attained the status of a minor classic. The present version isn't a remake, but a homage and extension of the original. At the end of the '56 version, the "invasion" consumed a small town and was being transported to other parts of the country. Now the setting is San Francisco, and the threat is much larger in scope and significance.

Donald Sutherland plays Matthew, a health inspector whose co-worker (Brooke Adams) suspects her boyfriend of being "different", "just not himself". When identical occurrences become apparent, the film's momentum gains speed as the central characters become aware of some secret phenomenon, apparently emanating from outer space.

The suspense and horror of Invasion of the Body Snatchers isn't derived from the plot so much as the bizarre and oppressive atmosphere created by the camerawork of Michael Chapman, musical composer Charles Rosen, and sound effects man Ben Burt. The presence of extreme camera angles, unsettling perspectives, synthesized music, and the cracking noise of the "pods", produce the eerie feeling of a society gone crazy. The strange occurrences at the beginning of the film become visually explicit, as the conspiracy of mass indoctrination takes command of almost everyone except our heroes. The touching, humanistic scenes between Sutherland and Adams are offset as we see the weird transformation of half-formed bodies into perfect duplications of living

BFA work at Agnes

Madeline Mills

The opening of the Bachelor of Fine Arts on View exhibition was held on Tuesday night of March 13, at the Agnes Etherington Arts Center. This show is an exhibition of painting, prints and sculpture which were executed by the students of the BFA faculty. The works on display were picked by a jury from the art department Technical ability as well as creativity within a medium were the qualities the judges looked for in their selections taken from all four years.

The work from the first two years concern a structured project that was outlined to the students by a professor. Within this strict framework they had to show expertise in handling and imagination. The third and fourth year students' works were of their own creation and in the medium of their choice.

The opening was well attended and there was a favourable reaction from the crowd. However two problems with the show became apparent.

There are so many mediums, different artists and ranges of styles that the show may be confusing. However, this could not be helped because of the nature and the purpose of the show. Second, the images are not labelled with respect to names, medium and titles (in the cases where there were titles), the viewer is merely handed a sheet of names.

Despite these two problems the show is colourful, fun and interesting. One is aware that there is a great deal of talent at Queen's and it seems likely that we will be hearing from some of these artists in the future.

Health inspector Donald Sutherland

people. Sleep and the unconscious must be resisted in order to survive.

Director Philip Kaufman has carefully crafted a film which, while acknowledging the power of Siegel's original, is able to stand on its own as a metaphoric vision of ideological authoritarianism. Individualism is more of an endangered concept than it was in the uptight era of twenty years ago. It has been severely battered, its viability thrown into doubt. The power of a society to control people's behaviour and thoughts is the frightening premise that Invasion of the Body Snatchers tackles skillfully and with conviction.

That the movie holds up the populist ethic as a combatant against a 1984-like world doesn't weaken its force. It provides a exciting two hours of gripping and plausible escapism.

Record Reviews

The Tubes: Remote Control reviewed by Brent Lavicoire

And now, from the people who brought you "White Punks on Dope" and "Don't Touch Me There", comes a landmark album, Remote Control. Quite likely their best and probably destined to be the biggest selling Tubes album ever.

The reason for such soaring optimism? What made Meat Loaf a monster? Who's a wizard, a true star? In a name—Todd Rundgren. Aside from the two Rundgren compositions on Remote Control, his most obvious influence lies in the production. A group that was new wave before most of us ever heard the term, The Tubes present a perfect medium for Rundgren's genius and I don't think Rundgren's done a job like this since his Initiation album.

The Tubes have never sounded better. As a result, it's debatable whether they actually sound like The Tubes. All of the cuts on Remote Control sound as if they could have come from a number of Rundgren albums, especially Ra, so complete is his domination on the album.

Like previous Tubes albums, there's a good deal of anarchy on Remote Control. But their sarcasm is not so blatantly sexual this time around. Electronics, especially those of a video nature, bear the brunt of a savage and hilarious Tubes attack. The assault is cohesively preconceived, brilliantly executed and devastatingly effective.

"Turn Me On" is the perfect opening track. It introduces the album's television motif (the back cover shows the group waving 'bye from the cubicles of the Hollywood Squares set) and, beginning with a computerized synthesizer bass line, evolves into a very, very punchy song. Rundgren's composition, "TV is King", follows, while Ra Styles' gorgeous vocals on "Prime Time", "No Mercy", told from the perspective of a somewhat paranoid television (Back in my home world nobody bugs me, But here on the shop floor they show me no mercy) and the rest of the songs on the album all add up to and culminate in the final track, "Telecide", the perfect closing song, "What a lovely way to die/television suicide". As always with The Tubes, behind a complex but tight and powerfully moving album lurks a fantastically ridiculous message.

It's great music and lots of fun to listen to; Remote Control can't fail.

PETER ALLEN

Peter Allen: I Could Have Been a Sailor reviewed by Brent Lavicoire

Peter Allen is a timeless performer, his music, likewise, defies concise categorization. He belongs to the Neil Sedaka mould but, as a songwriter, he's one of the best, certainly better than Sedaka despite not being as successful perhaps.

Raised on the international performing circuit (one time husband to Liza Minelli), Peter Allen's lyrics and music reflect a very international spectrum of mood and sound. At once this is purely a Vegas night-club sampler and a solid anti-commercial album. Perhaps the difference lies in the fact that Allen takes the traditional milk-toast, AM format, sentimental pop song (take that horrible song, "Feelings" as an example) and transcends the tradition with fine instrumentation and sincere lyrics. Allen stresses the fact that his songs come from within his experience; no where on I Could Have Been a Sailor is there a song that seems remotely contrived or insincere.

Produced by Marvin Hamlisch and Mike Post with the likes of Leland Sklar, Larry Knechtel, David Spinoza and Victor Feldman doing instrumentals, the album is a joy just to relax to; its positive attitude is infectious.

I Could Have Been a Sailor covers a wide range from the pseudo-disco cut, "Don't Wish Too Hard", to the ragtime-modern orchestration fusion of "Paris at 21". "Don't Cry Out Loud", co-authored by Carole Bayer Sager, previously recorded by Mellissa Manchester, is quite likely the most beautiful song of its genre since Judy Collins' recording of Stephen Sondheim's "Send in the clowns".

Having recently left New York for the west coast, Peter Allen's return to Broadway should be triumphant if this album sells as well as it deserves. If you're into quality easy listening material, get into I Could Have Been a Sailor.

Granati Bros.: G. Force reviewed by Brent Lavicoire

For a group that boasts two drummers and two keyboard players, the single guitarist, David Granati, takes an unexpected amount of foreground on this album. But then, it's David Granati's meaty licks and tight little leads that make this album worth listening to in places.

Your basic family garage band from Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania, the four Granati brothers and a cousin owe their contract to producer Ray Shulman (of Gentle Giant fame) who discovered them quite by accident. An unfortunate accident indeed. For the most part, G. Force is unimaginative with matching production from a former studio expert.

G. Force does have its moments, however. "No Stone Unturned" sounds like a previously unreleased Traffic song from the days of Steve Winwood while "It Was You" sounds a lot like The Rascals—an odd combination. The smattering of reggae influence on "Nite Life" and "Take Up My Time" makes them the best tracks on the album but the out and out "rock" songs couldn't incite me to do anything other than turn the volume down. For a group who package themselves as a "heavy" band, "Our goal is to make 'em wet down below", they've got serious problems.

If these guys are going to be commercially successful they'd better switch to a pop format, quickly. They'll never do it with a misapplied tough approach.

Two Gaels split MVP honours

Gaels Jim D'Andrea

Donald MacKinnon

The Queen's Golden Gaels football team held its annual awards dinner on Saturday March 10. The highlight of the evening was the presentation of the teams most valuable player award. For the second year in succession two players tied for top honours; Bob Mullen and Jim D'Andrea. Last year Jim Rutka and Dave Marinucci shared the award.

The surprised, but deserving winners, were two of ten players nominated, a tribute to the depth and leadership talent on this season's Gaels.

Overlooked on the All-Star balloting but not by his team mates, defensive tackle Ross Francis was selected as the team's outstanding lineman.

The only selection that was never in doubt was the announcement of halfback Tom McCartney as the outstanding rookie.

Mullen, who started the year in the defensive secondary, was called on to lead the team as the quarterback for the second half of the season. After the announcement Bob modestly claimed "it was a nice surprise but that there were a lot of valuable players on this year's team".

D'Andrea had an outstanding year in the Gaels' defensive secondary making the Allstar team for the 3rd year in a row. Jim also served as the team's defensive captain.

Co-MVP Bob Mullen

Defensive tackle Ross Francis [61] was selected Gaels' top lineman.

Outstanding play by Tom McCartney earned him rookie honours.

Sport scholarship issue raised

Tim Turnbull

Once again, the controversy over athletic scholarships has raised its ugly head and the usual arguments are being bandied about. Before the accusations degenerate to the level of 'free-loading dumb jocks' versus 'narrow-minded academic purists', some reasonable thoughts should be presented.

Canadian universities have resisted giving scholarships to promising athletes, only to see those youngsters head south to American schools. While some good athletes have remained in Canada (Bruce Kidd and Abby Hoffman are obvious examples), they face huge financial obstacles in order to continue training. A world class athlete has to devote a large proportion of his time to practice. Holding a steady job at the same time is nearly impossible.

University is perhaps the best place to develop high quality athletes. A student with a good academic standing could work at his or her chosen sport without worry of monetary problems, if scholarships were available. Intercollegiate competition, while fairly good, lacks the funds and coaching to exploit the potential of Canadian athletes. Granting scholarships to deserving students would be a positive step.

Canadians can complain until they are blue in the face about the poor quality of domestic sport, preferring to watch American college and professional games instead. Perhaps Canadians enjoy perverse pride in being inferior, but that attitude should be changed. It is about time that we raised our heads out of the sand and realized that developing good athletes costs money.

Higher education is more than academics as most Queen's students realize. Many students subscribe to the old adage "a sound body and a sound mind." The pursuit of excellence should be extended to athletic as well as academic endeavour.

Negative arguments, while based on principles, are really concerned with cost. Canadian universities fear that with the introduction of scholarships, "jocks" are given an unfair advantage in attending school. Money that could go to research may be re-allocated to help bolster the football or hockey program. Athletes are given a free ride so that they can contribute to athletics and assist a winning team. Critics question whether this outlay of money is worth the added prestige gained from success. Another charge is that intercollegiate sports should be open to any student, rather than a pampered elite.

These objections are influenced by the American experience. To some extent, these charges have some basis of fact. The amount of corruption in college sports is well known, as many U.S. football players major in 'communications' and few graduate. Sport is a big business in the States and the stakes are much higher than in Canada. But surely Iona Campagnolo and Sports Canada can learn from American excesses.

As long as scholarships are judiciously granted and academic standards are maintained, the system can work in Canada. Money that has been reaching athletes under the table could be placed in scholarship funds. Funds would not have to be removed from other university services or programs.

At a time when Canadians are becoming more aware of personal fitness, isn't it about time that we helped Canadian athletes excel at home? Scholarships can provide an added incentive to young athletes to continue training and achieve their potential. Canadians can be as good as anyone else in the world. Why not give our athletes the chance to prove it?

Colour Night caps athletic year

Lee Prowse

The culmination of a great sporting year at Queen's will take place on Thursday at 7 p.m. in the Bartlett Gym. Athletes from Queen's forty-four intercollegiate teams will attend Colour Night to be honoured and to honour their fellow athletes.

Queen's major athletic awards

ALFIE PIERCE TROPHY

The ALFIE PIERCE TROPHY, presented by Arts '53 is a tribute to Alfie Pierce who gave a lifetime of dedication to training and helping the intercollegiate teams of the University. It is awarded annually to the male student and the female student who contributes most to Intercollegiate Athletics in the first year at Queen's.

JACK JARVIS TROPHY

The JACK JARVIS TROPHY is awarded annually to the outstanding graduating student in Intercollegiate individual sports as decided by a committee of coaches. It was presented in 1963 as a tribute to Jack Jarvis, who for 33 years was coach of the Queen's boxing team.

PHE '55 ALUMNAE TROPHY

PHE '55 ALUMNAE TROPHY, presented in 1964 by the female members of the Physical Education 1955. It is awarded annually to the final year woman student who has brought most honour to Queen's University by her athletic and scholastic achievements.

JENKINS TROPHY

This large sterling silver trophy was presented by Mr. Thomas Jenkins in 1930. It is awarded annually to the graduating student who has brought most honour to Queen's by his athletic and scholastic ability.

AWARD OF MERIT

An award exemplifying the spirit of Queen's Female Athlete. It is to be presented to the female athlete who best displays the qualities of leadership, sportsmanship, dedication and all round consistency in an exceptional contribution to her team through participation in her sport.

Colour Night includes presentation of Q's to athletes who have competed for their first year at the intercollegiate level, team awards to outstanding players and rookies, major athletic awards and plaques to championship teams will be awarded.

The Queen's intercollegiate program is one of the largest in Canada and this year its results were the best Queen's and most other Canadian universities have ever witnessed ten championship teams and six strong runners-up. The ten championship teams include: football, women's ice hockey, Rugby, Rugby II's, Women's Squash, Synchronized Swimming, Men's Track and Field (outdoors), Women's Cross country, Men's Alpine Skiing, Varsity Eight Men's Rowing.

The Masters of Ceremonies, both organizers of the evening, are Joe Schnitker, a member of the swim team, and Bev Webb. Principal Watts will give a speech to the athletes and Mark Bennet of the Soccer team will reply on behalf of the athletes.

The presentation of major awards is the highlight of the evening. The Alfie Pierce award is a dual presentation given to both the top freshman male and female athletes. The award of Merit and the Jarvis Trophy are given respectively to the female and male athletes who have contributed most to an individual sport.

WIC FLICKS

Cathy Lawrence

On Saturday night, Nursing '80 emerged victorious in the WIC ice hockey championship. They defeated 4A by a close score of 4-3. The star of the game was goalie Sheila Marchell, who repeatedly fought off the tough 4A offense. Nursing's Hilary Black scored twice while Cheryl Eyman and Dawn Nixon each picked up one. Julie Maloney and Carolyn Grant scored for 4A. The remaining players of the victorious Nursing lineup are Pam Wilson, Alexis Mageau and Lyn Allison. The team would like to say thanks to their coach and friend, Bruce Grant, who faithfully led them through a tough season.

Congratulations to PHE '82 winners of the co-ed volleyball championship.

All awards were presented at the WIC banquet last Sunday, March 18th.

The outgoing executive would like to congratulate the newly elected team for '79-'80.

START A MANAGEMENT CAREER IN BUYING OR DISTRIBUTION

Procter & Gamble Canada markets over 30 well-known brands with leadership in almost every market in which we compete.

These brands are supported by a highly professional group of Purchasing and Distribution Managers. The Managers play a very important role in ensuring that our brands remain the leaders in their field.

Right now we are looking for a few highly qualified individuals to start as an Associate Buyer or Distribution Analyst. Your degree can be in any discipline. We're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership. Superior achievement in school or business, innovative, a record of being able to get things done, and good communication skills are some of the words we use to describe the people who are successful at Procter & Gamble.

As an Associate Buyer you will become the company's market expert in your field, evaluating materials and sources to meet the company's needs and ensuring their availability for uninterrupted operation. With the support of an assistant, you will have responsibility for all aspects of daily purchasing functions as well as be instrumental in developing and achieving long range supply objectives.

As a Distribution Analyst your responsibilities will be concerned initially with a specific aspect of inventory and/or traffic management. You will operate an important function in the company's growing distribution area, providing logistical support for the company's marketing plans.

We believe that the quality of our people is what makes us successful. This is why we will take a special interest in your personal development. From the very first day, you will assume challenging assignments and you will be increasingly responsible for contributing to the business as you develop. The emphasis will be on you, your ideas, and your ability to contribute.

Career prospects are excellent with promotion directly from within and based solely upon the individual's performance. Procter & Gamble offers salaries which are competitive with the leading firms in the community, and an outstanding package of employee benefits.

If you are a highly achievement-oriented person, you should be interested in Management at Procter & Gamble. Please forward a resume, including a recap of achievements to:

What's up, doc?

Ontario's system of socialized health care is being threatened by an exodus. Doctors are leaving OHIP in large numbers, by charging fees above that which OHIP will cover, leaving the patient to make up the difference.

The doctors involved claim that this recreates a more direct link between doctor and patient (although one can speculate that most patients would prefer not to have this particular direct link), lets people know just how costly health care really is, and allows for price discrimination whereby the wealthier patients would pay more than those less advantaged.

But the crucial fact is that this represents a return to health care rationed out to those with dollars—something our society has already determined is morally intolerable, recognizing that each individual is fully entitled to the best health care our society can provide. This is a principle from which we should not retreat.

It is, of course, the poorest who suffer the most. Additional fees will be most deterring to those who can least afford them. Many have been, and will be, forced to change doctors—and some whole communities are being left without any "OHIP doctor" at all. This is in light of the extremely regressive payments system which finances OHIP, except for the very poorest, everyone pays the same. These developments of late do little towards advancing the cause of a "just society".

Making people aware of health costs is, of course, desirable in order to prevent unconscious abuse of the system. But there are surely more humane and "just" ways of going about it. A copy of the OHIP bill could be sent to the individual who has required medical treatment, for instance.

As for the argument that doctors could practice progressive price discrimination, while this might be possible, it is generally agreed that such "charity" in an area as critical as health care is degrading and inhibits individuals from taking full advantage of these "benefits".

The existing inadequacies of a state-subsidized medical program which is regressive in its assessment of costs are obvious. The situation is only worsened when doctors desert the program. What is required is for OHIP's costs to be assessed progressively, as are most government revenues, and actions taken to keep doctors within the OHIP plan.

The fundamental premise which brought us OHIP in the first place—equal health care for all—is being challenged. It is time to recall our sense of equity, and social concern.

Guinea pigs in a risky experiment

Proponents of change for the sake of saving money are often surprised to learn that established methods can be just as cheap when factors other than money are considered.

The merger to take place between Job Bank and the Canada Employment Centre for Students (CECS) may well be one such case.

The combination will save the AMS $6,000 and it is also argued that job-hunting in the summer will become more efficient. However, the validity of this argument is questionable for the following reasons.

Job Bank was a unique employment service. Unlike CECS, it was controlled entirely by Queen's students and geared overwhelmingly toward finding students in Kingston for the summer either full or part-time jobs. Under CECS the AMS will not necessarily have direct input into the operation of the service, and the emphasis placed upon finding jobs for Queen's students will no longer predominate.

Job Bank also operated a simple service. Both prospective employers and employees found it less intimidating and more effective than the government-run Manpower services (of which CECS is a part). One has only to look at the number of casual summer jobs posted and filled through Job Bank in relation to CECS to realize this. Furthermore, over the years Job Bank has developed a good working relationship with the Kingston Community. With the realization that Job Bank is now run by the government may come a corresponding disinclination on the part of residents who want odd jobs done to post through the service.

When analyzed in terms of fulfilling student's summer job requirements, actual dollar savings become secondary. Considering the importance of summer jobs to most Queen's students, experimenting with an alternative to the student-controlled Job Bank may not have been the best idea.

Senate shuts doors to discuss report

Beth McKenzie

Controversy arose last week when Queen's University Senate chose to prepare its official response to the P.S. Report in a closed session, denying entrance to all but official members.

In response to complaints that, since changes in the tuition fee system would have major effects on students, they should have had the opportunity to voice their opinions before policy was set, Principal Watts stated, "This meeting was held to discuss the draft of a policy. We did not want people to get the impression that something is official policy before it had even been discussed. This is not a statement of university policy, but is simply a brief to the ministry in response to the suggestions in the P.S. Report."

In their discussion, the university rejected several of the Report's suggestions, including widening differentiation of fees between faculties, and increasing the percentage of the education costs paid for by the student from 16 per cent to 20 per cent.

However, the Senate supported the unpegging of tuition fees. According to Watts, if universities are free to set their own fees, "it will enable them to provide the quality of education which students deserve." They also supported the idea that the average tuition fee in the province should increase with the annual rate of inflation, but added that universities should be free to vary the tuition fee as they saw fit.

The final draft of the brief will be discussed at the March 29 meeting of Senate.

I have to study now. In just a second, I'll stand up and go inside and study. Yes sir, here I go, getting up...any moment now...

Admission to the Tricolour Society is the highest non-academic award that can be conferred on a Queen's student. Each spring the award is presented to those students who have rendered valuable and distinguished service to the University. Those admitted to the Tricolour Society this year are (from left to right) Hugh Christie (Law '81), Margaret Churcher Meds '79, John Ronson (Law '79) and Charlie Lund (Sc. '79).

Reeve awarded for enthusiastic teaching

Dr. William C. Reeve, assistant professor of German, is the 1979 recipient of the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching.

In a letter to the selection committee in support of Dr. Reeve, 21 of his students said this: "You feel as though you have a friend in the classroom, always ready to lead you out of difficulties as he leads you into all the interesting aspects of his subject."

It was just such comments that won Dr. Reeve the prestigious award. At spring convocation he will receive from Chancellor Roland Michener a certificate of merit and $1,000.

The award recognizes faculty members whose "knowledge of their field and ability to motivate and communicate to students are outstanding."

It is evident from other comments to the selection committee that Dr. Reeve, 36, not only has a thorough grasp of his subject but can relay that knowledge effectively. His enthusiasm and dedication, described by one student as "infectious", produces classes punctuated with "lively discussions and heated debates."

"Plasticity of thought" is how another student terms his his interest in the individual. "He shows himself to be concerned with each individual's development, making sure that every member of his class understands the point at hand," notes one student-letter.

A former student recounts an instance when Dr. Reeve personally tutored a small group of students after hours so they could continue their studies. "His door is always open."

A native of Toronto he holds an Honors BA from the University of Toronto and a master of arts and a doctorate — both in Germanic languages and literature — from Cornell University. Dr. Reeve taught for a year at Cornell before coming to Queen's in 1971.

The 1979 selection committee was chaired by last year's recipient Catherine R. Harland of the English department. Other award winners have been Profs. William Gilbert (mechanical engineering), R.S. Ryan (law) and A.R.C. Duncan (philosophy).

Library hours change

In order to provide some extra study time for the exam period, Douglas Library hours will be extended for the Stacks, Circulation Desk, Main Reading and Reference Rooms from 9 April through to 27 April as follows: Monday to Thursday 8:00 a.m. - 1:00 a.m., Friday 8:00 a.m. - 11:00 p.m., Saturday 9:00 a.m. - 11:00 p.m., Sunday 1:00 p.m. - 12:00 midnight.

Reserve Room hours will be Monday to Thursday 8:00 a.m. - 11:00 p.m., Friday 8:00 a.m. - 10:00 p.m., Saturday 9:00 a.m. - 10:00 p.m., Sunday 1:00 - 11:00 p.m.

TEACHERS

The Company of the Cross operates three residential private boys' schools: St. John's of Ontario, St. John's Cathedral Boys' School of Manitoba and St. John's of Alberta. We are looking for dedicated staff to teach in schools where:

- the emphasis is on morality and Christian living
- a demanding academic curriculum is coupled with a structured work program and an exciting outdoor program of canoeing and snowboeing
- the staff live and work together in a self-supporting Christian community
- the rewards are other than financial

Qualifications: A Bachelor's degree in a recognized subject or a public school teaching certificate.

P. S. Ross Report

Doug Ronson

"Tuition will rise to $1384 next year." This might be a Journal headline for March, 1983. Alternatively, it might read: "Brock, Trent forced to close due to inadequate funding."

Fantasy? It may not be if the Ontario government adopts certain tuition models proposed by the P.S. Ross Report on Tuition and Incidental Fees. The report proposes a number of alternative tuition fee models. Some of these, if adopted, could have serious detrimental effects on the quality of university education in Ontario.

The two new proposals are the following: 1) linking tuition fees to the cost of education. It has been suggested that students should pay about 20 per cent of the total cost. 2) Allow universities to charge whatever fee they desire. Students would also be expected to pay a fee in proportion to the cost of their program; in other words, students in expensive programs such as Medicine would be expected to pay a greater amount.

The report also mentions such models as leaving fees unchanged or charging no tuition, but the government is not expected to consider these seriously.

If tuition is indexed to education costs students could face astronomical tuition increases over the next few years. The OFS reports that if fees are indexed at 20 per cent of the cost and enrolment continues to fall, students could be paying $1384 by 1984. The Federation has questioned whether OSAP can counteract the effect of higher tuition fees on enrolment.

"The implementation of the model allowing universities to set their own fees would threaten the very existence of our weaker sister universities," said AMS Researcher Flinor Mahoney.

This model might result in high priced universities for the rich and low priced universities for the poor.

If this were to occur it would be the death of universal accessibility to which the Ontario Government is supposed to be committed," Mahoney added. The smaller universities, already in financial difficulties, might be forced to close as their revenues decline.

A variation of this model would have students pay fees according to the cost of their program. Meds students, for example, would pay about $2500 tuition because medical training is so expensive.

Although he is waiting to read the AMS Report on tuition, AMS President Richard Binhammer said that he favours differential fees for both programs and universities.

"Why shouldn't students in Meds be expected to pay greater amounts if their programs are more expensive," he said.

Council to examine restructuring report

Eric Evans

Outer Council will be presented with an informational report, and a motion to strike an AMS structural review committee at its meeting this Thursday night. The report, prepared by some concerned students, stresses the need for a continuing examination of the AMS structure to ensure that it is meeting changing student demands.

The report contends that fundamental problems exist in several areas of the existing structure. This includes the problems of determining the balance of power between the Board of Directors and Outer Council, the role of the Campus Activities Commission, and the relationship between the AMS and the faculty societies.

The motion being presented would create, if passed by Council, a committee to review the existing problems and suggest possible changes for Council discussion during the 1979-80 school year. Vickie Steele, mover of the motion stated, "It is essential that a committee be set up now so that it can examine the inadequacies of the existing system and do research into the structures of other universities over the summer. This way, Outer Council will have a wide base of information on which to make their decisions."

Charlie Lund, past chairman of the Board of Directors, who is seconding the motion said, "From my experience, the existing system is a mess. It is important that this committee be set up now before acute problems develop."

Student paper nearly censored

Shelly Matson

University of Manitoba's Election Committee recently failed to gain support for its motion to censure the university newspaper, The Manitoban. The motion was an attempt to stop the paper from printing a number of charges against President Steve Ashton during his campaign for re-election.

The Manitoban printed the accusations on March 1, declaring that Ashton attempted to misappropriate student funds, doctored the minutes of the founding meeting of the Student Association of Manitoba, and misrepresented the student union at a Manitoba Federation of Labour Convention last October.

The Election Committee felt the Ashton expose "was detrimental to one candidate" and shouldn't be published until after the election. The Manitoban staff declared they "had a responsibility to the students."

Ashton labelled the comments "libelous" and declared "I'll be consulting my lawyers." He questioned the paper's motives in waiting since last fall to print the charges. Editor Bob Nixon said he would have "loved to have printed it three or four months ago" but the information just recently became available.

Paris - A violent demonstration protesting against unemployment broke out in Paris last week. After the 70,000-strong demonstration, gangs of youths with iron bars and gasoline bombs rampaged through central Paris injuring 70 gendarmes and causing a great deal of damage.
Unemployment in France is presently 5.8% with steel textile and ship-building workers the worst affected.

Ontario - The Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, Dr. Bette Stephenson has suggested that University students be allowed to take some of their courses at a community college. Dr. Stephenson said such a move would enable students to gain job-related skills and earn a university degree at the same time.

Washington - Human-like footprints discovered in hardened volcanic ash are the first concrete proof that an ancestor of man walked upright more than 3 million years ago. The noted anthropologist Dr. Mary Leakey said the prints, discovered in East Africa, show upright walking preceding development of a large brain and toolmaking.

U.S. - A study recently done by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency painted a gloomy picture yesterday for U.S. recovery from the loss of Iranian oil. They warned of major shortages, higher prices and an economic shutdown.

Washington - Maggie got vetoed - Mrs. Trudeau will not be promoting her book at the National Press Club in Washington. The chairman of the club's speaker's program, Richard Zimmerman, said he does not object to her saying she snorted coke or smoked pot in the PM's mansion in Ottawa. It is simply that his sources informed him that the book is not really very profound or important.

U.S. - The U.S. Attorney-General Griffen Bell announced yesterday that he has appointed Paul Curran as special counsel to conduct the remainder of the investigation into various loan transactions between the National Bank of Georgia and President Jimmy Carter's family peanut warehouse business.

Queen's Park - The Ontario Health Minister has given general practitioners an average fee increase of 14% since last May. However, the fact that one doctor in five has opted out of OHIP may demonstrate that fee levels are not their only complaints about the system.

The Prime Minister introduced himself as the devil and argued that his opponent was God. Shakespeare's Launcelot Gobbo sought advice from both sides, and finally joined the devil, but the whole debate was dismissed as academic and antiquated by the Zen Manifesto of the U. & J. Garage and Body Shop.

These were prize-winning antics at the Andrina McCulloch Public Speaking Competition Finals held on March 22. Sixteen competitors released all the stops on a range of argumentative oratorical and dramatic talents to compete for 9 prizes of $200, $100 and $50.

For the first time in the history of the competition, one person talked his way into prizes from all 3 categories. Andrew Taylor of the Queen's Debating Union stole 1st in Public Speaking for a hilarious 10-minute tirade on coffee in Kingston, then fought to a close second in debating, and tied Lyn Royce for 3rd prize in reading/drama, winning a total of $350.

First prize in reading/drama went to Julian Cunningham for his dramatization of Launcelot Gobbo's speech from the Merchant of Venice (II, ii).

The climax of the evening was the final debate between Taylor and Corbett, chaired by Dr. Ned Franks.
"Resolved that the Opposition should win this debate." The debaters promptly launched into a rich interchange between the Devil as Government and God as opposition, amid a flurry of humorous heckles from the audience. Dave Corbett narrowly emerged as victor, but it is unclear whether this means that he won or lost.

Health Research to be debated

Stephen Zimmer: Special

On Tuesday March 27, at 7 p.m., a meeting of the Kingston chapter of Canadians for Health Research will be held in room 8143 of Botterell Hall.

The objectives of CHR are to inform Canadians of the benefits of health research and to improve communication between scientists and other members of the public.

Canadian researchers have made a number of significant contributions toward health research. However, the future of health research in Canada may be in doubt, for the government's research budget has not kept pace with inflation. This may well lead to a deterioration in research being done in this country.

HOW MUCH IS A SMILE WORTH?

For our visitors a warm welcome can be just as important as fantastic scenery or exciting cities. And that's where you come in—with a smile and attitude that says loud and clear: "I'd like to help make your stay a pleasant one."

Making visitors feel welcome is vital to the continued growth of tourism in Canada

Like thousands of students across Canada, you may depend on seasonal employment in Canada's tourist industry to help pay for education and living costs.

And it's obvious that this source of income relates directly to the number of tourists who travel and vacation in Canada (i.e. more tourists... more jobs!)

Each welcoming smile and handshake fosters national unity and international goodwill and helps protect a source of income for almost a million Canadians... and that could mean you!

It's worth keeping in mind the next time a visitor asks you for directions or help—because tourism is important to all of us

A new merger defended: Change will help students

The Editor:

As the Director of the newly created Job Bank/CECS combined student placement service, I must take issue with the editorial "Guinea pigs in a risky experiment" which appeared in the Journal on March 20th. The principal points raised in the editorial concerned the "uniqueness" of Job Bank, the issue of "control", and the respective reputations of Job Bank and the CECS.

Canada Employment Centres for Students are themselves "unique". They have been in existence for only ten years and, like Job Bank, are designed to serve exclusively the employment needs of students during the summer months. Close liaison has been established in all areas with local employers, service clubs, Chambers of Commerce, volunteer groups, social service agencies, and educational institutions of all kinds.

The "uniqueness" of Job Bank lies in its traditional emphasis on short-term odd jobs for students. The vast majority of jobs posted with Job Bank have been of this variety. On the other hand, approximately 1200 more fulltime summer positions were posted with the CECS than with Job Bank in the same period. Amalgamation should give us the best of both worlds.

The second point raised in the editorial concerned the issue of "control" of the employment service. I would like to make it clear that the CECS, like Job Bank, is staffed and supervised by students and recent graduates - not career civil servants. I would like to point out that I am a part-time Queen's student. The Student Placement Officers who worked in the operation last year were all students at Queen's and the vast majority of applicants for these positions this year are from the same quarter.

The CECS operates as an essentially autonomous unit within a larger government department. It has its own budget, controls its own advertising and promotional campaigns, and basically runs its own show. As far as "control" is concerned, the CECS is run exclusively by and for students, and the interests of Queen's students are more than adequately represented. Regular meetings with AMS representatives will be held to keep the AMS informed of the progress of the programme.

The last point raised in the editorial concerned the respective

"reputations" of Job Bank and the CECS. The suggestion was that our service is too complicated, too "intimidating", and that both students and employers would be reluctant to use a service which was even loosely connected with government. Mr. Beck and Mr. Binhammer, who sponsored the amalgamation proposal put to Outer Council, entertained similar fears which, after discussion and a visit to my office, were quickly dispelled. As far as the "intimidation" factor is concerned, perhaps the author of the editorial in question should have asked for opinions from the 4000 students (most of them from Queen's) who registered with our office last summer and had no qualms whatsoever about using our service - or the just under 2000 students who found work through our efforts. Our success is due to the speed and quality of service provided to employers, the effectiveness of our promotional campaign and the quality of the students who man the CECS each summer as coordinators and Student Placement Officers.

In conclusion, the concerns which you expressed were also expressed by Mr. Binhammer and Mr. Beck (who ultimately sponsored the resolution to merge) and by Outer Council members and students at large. After considerable discussion, all fears were put to rest - the vote was overwhelmingly in favour of amalgamation. Contrary to what you have argued, the $6000 saving to AMS was barely mentioned. The debate revolved around the delivery of the employment service to students. I am convinced that the members of Outer Council are confident that amalgamation is definitely in the best interest of all concerned.

Sincerely, R. Brian Reid

It is difficult to say anything about Margaret Trudeau which has not been said before. But as Canada approaches a federal election at one of the most critical points in its history, what is said about the wife of the Prime Minister has become astonishingly important. Perhaps we should attempt to put things into perspective.

Canada has never had such a sensational celebrity before. Margaret Trudeau is the darling of the international "papazi" and ranks with Princess Caroline in her ability to make news in the gossip publications of the world not to mention the more respectable media organizations as well. She is controversial and sexy, two characteristics which carry a lot of weight around the newsrooms of Canada and the world. Whether you like her or not Maggie sells.

Her attractiveness as a product causes a dilemma among journalists. Many would like to ignore her, but know they cannot, simply because of the competitive nature of the news business. The most evident example of this conflict amongst the media occurred last week with the disclosure of her affair with Senator Edward Kennedy. Maclean's magazine obtained the information, and leaked it to the rest of the media before its March 26th issue hit the newsstand. Witnessing the reaction to the story was like being a spectator to a journalistic game of chicken between the major news organizations of this country. Global Television used the disclosure for the headline story on that evening's six o'clock newscast, devoting a juicy ten minutes of air time to the event, including three separate reports and an editorial comment by Bruce Garvey which did all but call for the ousting of Pierre Trudeau. In contrast, C.B.C.'s National buried the story some fifteen minutes into their broadcast with a dry and curt announcement read by George McLean. The Toronto Star reminded its readers that excerpts from Mrs. Trudeau's book are soon to be serialized in their publication.

How important is Margaret-mania? In terms of a burning national issue, it is probably not very significant. Yet, its repercussions have frightening implications. A celebrity however pathetic she may be has captured the nation's imagination. She is propelled by a media which is as much to blame for her character as she is victims of her marketability. The power of that media is awesome, particularly in the fact of a federal election, yet so is their responsibility to the public. She will be a story only as long as their interests are aroused.

We must remember that journalists are an extension of ourselves. For the tragedy of Margaret Trudeau, we must all share the blame and address ourselves to whatever solutions we can find for this very personal national tragedy.

Corporate principles affect all of us

The Editor:

In 1972, 18,500 people worked for INCO's Sudbury operation. By September 15th, 1978 when the current strike began, the work force was 11,700. During this period, INCO's subsidiary operations in Guatemala (EXIMBOL) and Indonesia (P.T. INCO) have attracted $1 billion in investments. Most of this investment is guaranteed by Canadian tax payers through the Canadian Export Development Corporation.

INCO's motivation is clear: to monopolize world nickel reserves and to secure a cheap and compliant labour force with the assistance of repressive right wing regimes. What is worse is that this is being accomplished with the assistance of the Canadian government.

INCO's investments do not even have the merit of helping Third World development. For instance, INCO's Guatemalan investment amounts to $224 million, but it will employ only 750 workers. Only 3 per cent of the Guatemalan labour force is unionized, average annual income is only $50 and unemployment runs at 50 per cent. The Guatemalan government has been severely criticized by human rights groups for the activities of right wing death squads who assassinated 876 union leaders, students, lawyers and peasants in 1976 alone.

The Sudbury workers have been criticized as "fool-hardy" for beginning a strike in the face of a huge stock pile of nickel held by INCO. This criticism has generally been ill-informed. This is not simple a strike over wages in which the momentary bargaining strength of the two parties is being weighed. Fundamentally, what is at issue is the power of corporations to arbitrarily make decisions which jeopardize both the future livelihood of an entire community and an essential basis of the nation's economy. The INCO workers realized that to prolong negotiations would have allowed the company to build up an even larger stock pile and perhaps reduce the Sudbury labour force even further.

With this background of lay-offs and insecurity about the future, the union entered negotiations concentrating on pensions, job security, supplementary unemployment benefits for people laid-off and job safety. Wages were not the chief issue even though the workers had suffered a real loss in income because of wage controls.

Seen in this light, the struggle of Local 6500 cannot be dismissed as "just another strike". It is an issue of concern to all Canadians.

Eric Evans

With summer approaching all too rapidly, many of us will soon be subjected, once again, to that strange group we affectionately call parents. For those of us working at home for the summer, we're going to have to face the idiosyncracies of this group.

So often we are told by our elders that we are quick to bow to fashion and fads and that we act in occasionally unorthodox ways. Perhaps they should remember the old saying about people living in glass houses being wise not to throw stones. I would suggest that the 40 to 60 age group is probably the most fad-oriented section of the population.

How many shrewd sports store salespeople (I say people because middle-aged men are suckers for female salespeople) have sold our parents on new sports? Exercise is big, so parents go out and buy bicycles (the best in 10-speeds, of course). This results in sore muscles, so the bikes soon get shoved to the back of the garage.

Golf seems like a relaxing sport where you can get out into the great outdoors. It isn't. I am certain that there are many households with complete sets of golf clubs, shoes, gloves, etc. sitting in the basement with very few miles on them, next to the other adult toys stored there.

Tennis is another good one. The Adidas tennis shoes, Head tennis clothes and spiffy aircraft aluminum rackets that go with the tennis club membership often get put with the golf clothes when it is realized how much practice it takes to really play tennis.

Now that fathers have become bored with neat toys like snowmobiles, X-C skiing is very stylish. It's also hard work. However, since parents usually get fished into buying the very best equipment, sons and daughters can usually benefit from falling levels of interest and painful muscles.

One of the really important things in any undertaking by parents is that you have to buy the book. Every adult fad is accompanied by books and magazines on the subject. Books and magazines on tennis, golf, organic cooking, house plants, and how to do home repairs are really popular, depending on what is in style. There are even books and magazines on jogging. You have to read a book, it seems, to know how to run.

A really big thing with parents these days is the Harrowsmith mentality. Especially popular are wood stoves. A friend of our family, living proof that senility sets in after 40, is a good case in point. This man, a well-respected, pillar-of-the-community type, is a closet wood stove fanatic.

He started by buying a fancy, energy-saving model that he installed in his fireplace. Naturally, to save energy, he had a bricklayer come in and brick the stove into the old, rather attractive fireplace. Next, he decided that he would need wood, so he bought a wood lot. Of course, he also needed a chain saw. Next, he had to get the wood back to town, so he bought a trailer for his car. Things were going fairly well, until he realized that his chain saw was not big enough, so he had to buy a larger one.

It has gotten so bad that this father of two leaves his wife and children alone every weekend for his wood lot. And he has the gall to present his fuel bills to all who will listen because he saved $100 on his fuel bill. What makes matters even worse is that now he is talking about solar energy panels for the roof. Being a fairly diplomatic person, I restrain myself from mentioning that the sliding glass panels that take up one of the walls in his living room just might be responsible for at least some heat loss.

Yes, parents are a strange lot (and you will note that I have not even mentioned fun things like wine-making fetishes and compulsive vegetable garden obsessions). Perhaps it's a good thing summer is only four months long.

Nuclear expansion must be examined

The Editor:

The concept of the 'silent surrender' has been used to describe how the American domination of our economy occurred. This lack of consciousness by the Canadian people is now being realized again as nuclear technology plays an increasingly important role in our society. Although I favour the use of nuclear technology to aid our energy requirements, there are still a large number of major decisions to be made. The worst thing that could occur now would be for Canadians to accept this science in a silent and passive way.

In order for a liberal-democratic society to be effective, the public must be knowledgeable and informed of the major policies and decisions of the government. In addition to this, the government must provide for proper public input into the decision making process. Unfortunately, in Canada active involvement in the political system is low, especially in the case of nuclear energy and the problem is magnified by the fact that there are very limited forums for input into the system in this case. The expansion of nuclear technology has been a unilateral process carried out by the Ontario and federal governments. This action has led various interest groups to use extraparlimentary methods, such as the proposed demonstration to be held at Darlington this June, for voicing their disagreement.

Whether one realizes the seriousness of the issue or not, our governments and utilities are planning to expand the nuclear industry, yet they lack the legitimate support of the Canadian public. The major decisions to be made concerning nuclear energy are political. These questions relate to our quality of life, the quality of our environment, and the various energy options we wish to leave for our future generations. The decisions are difficult and in the end must be made by the government, but a solid understanding of the public's views is crucial to the decision making process.

For those of you who feel as I do and wish to become involved in the debate I recommend you begin by reading the Royal Commission's Interim Report on Nuclear Energy in Ontario entitled A Race Against Time (available from the Ontario Government and Ontario Hydro).

QUIET FEMALE STUDENT required to share 2-bedroom apartment which is large, well furnished and close to campus. Please call between 4 and 7 p.m. at 549-1937.

PIANO PLAYER WANTED to play at Chalet Restaurant on Friday and Saturday. Call 546-4081 between 7-9 p.m.

4 TO 8 MAN HOUSES FOR RENT. Close to campus. Dial 549-1887 or 549-4347.

FOUND: a bracelet, on the past between Mac-Corry and Dunning. Describe it and it's yours. Call 544-4497 and ask for Karen F.

WATERBEDS: KINGSTON says "don't listen to the bull you hear from know-nothings. You don't have the facts until you've talked to us". It doesn't cost anything to have us mail you our literature and prices so call WATERBEDS, 544-5549 (9-9 p.m.) and be informed tonight.

TIERED OF ZOO'S & animal houses? Want a private place to call home for $90 a month. Bright, carpeted, short walk to campus. Shared kitchen, bathroom and reading room. Call 549-4989.

WANT TO TALK TO SOMEONE? We're here and ready to listen. Try us: TAK, between 7 p.m. and 1 a.m., 544-1771.

GIRLS! I am offering professional hairstyling services only 10 minutes from campus. The atmosphere is relaxing and emphasis is on what YOU want - no assembly line cuts here! Call 542-2497.

HAIRSTYLING SERVICES include shampoos, cuts, blow-dry, curling, iron styling, repair jobs and manicures. If you're going to a formal, make your appointment early. Free consultations, and appointments any day of the week. 542-2497.

FOOD FOR YOUR HEAD: If you're in need of some quick cash, sell your hard-to-ever-used cut-it-walk-everywhere men's 16-speed to me! (no CCM's Sears specials please) call Big Bird 542-8069.

MODERN TWO BEDROOM APARTMENT with balcony. To sublet May-Sept. Laundry and parking facilities, close to downtown. Rent negotiable. Phone 544-8212.

TYPING SERVICES AVAILABLE, 75 cents per page, essay, resumes, theses. Call 542-8546 or 542-2206.

FOR SALE: bed, dresser with mirror, 9'x14' rug, and coffee table. Call Terry at 549-0646.

TO SUBLET: 6 person, fully furnished house, a large kitchen, parking space. Good central location, 2 minutes from both beer store and Dominion, 5 minutes from campus pub. Rent negotiable, available May 1, 399 Brock St. Phone us at 549-3809.

RIDE WANTED to New York City metropolitan area around April 6th or April 21st. Phone Anne at 542-8653.

FOUND: one Engineering jacket presumably "lost" at Beer Brewing contest. Owner may claim by identification at Info Bank.

FOR SALE: 1971 Opel GT sports car, 87,000 miles, asking $850. 542-7050.

FOR RENT: West Campus, 2 bedroom apartment, $245 monthly plus all utilities. Lease. Available May 1st. 549-7284.

NEED A PLACE IN SEPTEMBER? Mature individuals who care about their work and interpersonal relationships are required to fill our coed house - only $40 per month. Call Geoff or Ron at 544-4285.

HOMELSS: we are looking for 3 or 4 hardworking but wild guys to live in our co-ed house next year. 10 minutes from campus, fireplace, balcony etc. Call Kathy 544-8760.

FOR RENT 3 BEDROOM modern furnished apartment. Balcony, laundry facilities, and parking, $300 per month plus utilities (heating included in rent). Cable TV hookup. Phone 549-8431 weekdays 4 to 7, anytime weekends.

FURNITURE FOR SALE: 2 sofas (fair condition) $20 each; 1 chair $10; large desk $25; dining room table with chairs $30; single bed $20; dresser with mirror $25; bedside table $5. Call Kenner 544-9186.

COZY 2-BEDROOM APT. to sublet May 1 to Sept. 1-79, Van Order Complex, centrally located with front door bus service. Rent $170 a month, utilities included, apt. equipped with stove, fridge, parking and laundry facilities. Phone 546-076 Jan or Len.

TWO UPPER YEAR GIRLS looking for two bedroom house close to campus. Call Tracey 546-8055 or Sandy 549-1427 between 4:30-5:30pm.

SENSUAL SUMMER SUBLET: May 1-Sept. 1. For 2 people $130, for 3 people $150. Semi-furnished, cool basement apartment with private entrance. Located close to grocery & beer store, one block from Division and Princess. Phone 546-1338.

TOLL FREE "CZ2 ZLRONDO" ROWDIES of 914, 916 & 928 who made Friday a "surprising" experience - Thank for the "shower" of presents and cards and the "wet" kisses. The other two musketeers, J.R. ## Life is too precious to permit therapeutic abortion on demand

The Editor,

The question of abortion is a hot topic which inevitably draws arguments from many points of view and evokes a lot of emotion. I admit that in reading Mr. Reynold's article last week I reacted with disgust at the superficial level with which he and many others treat the subject. As a medical student I have grappled with the subject constantly but have come to realize that the medical profession as a whole will always follow the mores of their society. Therefore I feel that the public needs to think through all the issues more clearly and not just jump at what seems the easy way out.

The law reflects the uncertainty of our country in this matter, stating rather nebulously that an abortion is legal if the physical or mental health of the mother is threatened by the pregnancy. Not surprisingly, most abortions are performed legally today by deeming that the mother's mental health is being "scarred" by the pregnancy. I contend that the majority of these are done merely for convenience. In fact, in talking with many doctors, the view is often given that there is more scarring of the mother's conscience when an abortion is done than if she completes her pregnancy and offers the child for adoption. Today, the adoption agencies cannot provide enough children to meet the demands of sincere couples who wish to adopt. I have seen doctors give support to women with unwanted pregnancies including single teenagers and their families. I could see very little scarring. A young woman will not seek non-medical means of abortion if she has the support of her doctor.

I agree with Mr. Reynold's statement that the education of young teenagers is important so that they understand the risks of pregnancy. I do not go along with the widespread dishing out of contraceptives at this young an age as suggested by Mr. Reynold. Rather I think they should be encouraged to be responsible for their bodies and to come back at any time they want to talk more about it, (at which time contraception may be sought).

Now let us consider the real issue which is so important. Is the unborn embryo or fetus a life? For me there is no question that the unborn is a life according to any definition of the word. The heart of the embryo begins beating at 3 weeks, its nervous system is functioning and it has the general appearance of a human being by 6 weeks. Mr. Reynold states that in a democracy, the parents should be allowed to dictate

Exam-time mysteries explained:

The reason that so many profs hum and haw while explaining exam schedules and content is not that they are aware of the weightiness of their subject: it is because they have an itch in a private part and they are trying to figure out exactly how to scratch it in front of you suavely and unobtrusively.

The reason that roommates get testy around now is that each roommate wants to bring his or her "friend" back to the room after an evening out and both of them know that they should be studying instead.

The reason that student ghetto balconies are riddled with guitar players is that they are honing their talent, the one they know subconsciously that they will have to fall back on after April 28.

The reason that so many girls are wearing halter tops is that they are keeping in mind their other talent, the one they know subconsciously that they will have to fall back on after . . .

The reason that English students are wandering the streets muttering "I wandered lonely as a cloud..." under their breath is that they are consoling themselves with their familiarity with Wordsworth even if they don't know anything about Milton, who they know figures more prominently on their exam.

The reason that rock music is so popular with university students is that rock musicians make millions of dollars without, probably, even knowing how exactly to spell "Bachelor of Arts": this means true freedom.

The reason that direct long-distance phone calls out of residence are forbidden from late March onwards is that the sounds of wails emanating from the buildings as the students call home every night would be too much for the staff.

If they want an abortion, I say, what about the unborn child in the mother's womb? Who stands up for his/her rights? I heard a quote which went something like this, "The quality of a society can be judged by how it treats its weak members." Has

Mr. Reynold's ideal of "liberalism" come to mean unwillingness to accept any responsibility for our actions? Life is too precious to permit therapeutic abortion on demand if it won't be part of my therapy. Raymond Rahn

Nuclear power reconsidered

Glynis Thomas

When civilian nuclear power plants were first brought into being after the Second World War, they were seen as a safe, cheap and clean way of meeting electrical needs that would grow, it was believed, steadily and indefinitely into the future.

But the prospect of an electricity source "too cheap to meter" has vanished, and in its place is the spectre of an industry that has been collecting enormously deadly

using atomic fuel to boil water is like cutting butter with a chainsaw radioactive wastes and leaving them in temporary spent fuel bays. These short-term storage sites are now reaching capacity, not only at Pickering but also around the world.

The decision about the final resting place of these materials and about the future of the nuclear power industry will so seriously affect the shape of our future that they must be considered by all of us who share this world. Before turning to some of the broader issues of the nuclear question, let us first look at the basic operation of a nuclear power plant.

There is nothing particularly mysterious about the mechanical workings of a nuclear power plant. In a nutshell, the process is as follows: like coal or oil, the nuclear fuel-uranium-235 in CANDU is used to heat and boil water, and the steam sets turbines in motion which in turn produce electricity.

So one might well ask—what's the fuss about? It all seems so simple. Well it is precisely for this reason that the controversy begins. The mechanics of the process is simple, but because of the nature of atomic fuel the heating system is exceedingly complex and highly technical. Some have said that using atomic fuel to boil water is like cutting butter with a chainsaw.

Each phase of the nuclear fuel cycle involves risks, risks of such a serious nature that they must be avoided by finely tuned technological safeguards. Let us look at some of the dangers and at the measures that are taken for our protection.

First the reactor stage. The heat energy to boil the water is produced by the fissioning process of the uranium atom. The first thing that nuclear physicists making power plants had to figure out was a way of controlling the fissioning process, since, as we know, the chain reaction can occur extremely quickly: as it does in the atom bomb.

In CANDU, heavy water is used as the moderator and this seems to work pretty well. Nevertheless, situations can and do occur, where, for a variety of reasons, a loss of control takes place. It is reported that four LORA (loss of regulation accidents) took place at Pickering within one year, fortunately fast shutdown systems came to the rescue on all occasions.

Another critical feature of a nuclear reactor is its cooling system. Extremely high temperatures are generated in the fissioning process and the system must be continually bathed in water to make sure that the fuel bundles do not overheat. If they did, they could break through their thin zirconium sheaths and release deadly radioactive materials into the environment. Reactors are equipped with an ECCS (Emergency Core Cooling System) as a last-ditch defense against such an eventuality. A document leaked in June 1978, however, indicated that the ECCS systems in our operating CANDUs were not quite up to scratch. Both Bruce and Douglas Point stations have been derated (ordered to operate at less than capacity) as a result of design deficiencies. Later, it was reported that the Inter-Organizational Working Group—a joint committee of AECL, AECB, and Ontario Hydro—has suggested that safety standards be lowered so that our reactors would not be operating in contravention of their licence.

Just how serious would one of these accidents be if all safety back-up systems failed? The answer is: very serious indeed. If the fuel in a reactor reaches critical mass, a "meltdown" situation could occur where the fuel mass goes completely out of control and melts through the reactor floor and one-quarter mile into the earth, releasing massive amounts of radioactivity. The only official report that lists specific figures in its estimations sees a worst-case scenario of a reactor disaster as follows: 45,000 immediate cases of radiation sickness requiring hospitalization of which 3,300 would die, 45,000 fatal cancers in the thirty year period following the accident, 250,000 non-fatal cancers, 170 genetically defective children born annually after the accident, and $14 billion in property damage. This data was used in the U.S. Rasmussen Report, a study now discredited for a faulty methodology that led to an underestimation of the risks involved.

companies have refused to insure nuclear plants

Even Edward Teller, a leading nuclear scientist and father of the H-bomb, urges governments to build reactors 200 ft. underground as a precaution. A single mishap would cause extreme damage...not because of explosive force but because of radioactive contamination. Although the nuclear industry assures us that the safety features are sufficient, perhaps we should consider whether we are prepared to accept any level of risk at all when the consequences of a single mishap would be so disastrous.

It is worth wondering why, if the risk levels really are as low as the nuclear industry has maintained, have private insurance companies refused to insure nuclear power plants. In fact, some have calculated that if risk levels really are as low as it is maintained, a few thousand dollars a year would provide complete liability. But every country with a nuclear power plant industry has some form of Nuclear Liability Limitation Act—ours limits power plant liability to $75 million (compared to $545 million in the U.S.—a limit declared unconstitutional in North Carolina), a sum clearly unable to cover even the initial damages of a major accident. Considering that insurance companies have honed the calculation of statistical probabilities to an art, their reluctance is a sign that all is not as well as the industry would like us to believe.

But by concentrating on the reactor stage of the fuel cycle we have ignored the substantial risks that exist at either end of the cycle. Indeed the most controversial aspect of the whole industry is the seemingly unsolvable problem of long-term management of the highly toxic wastes produced by the nuclear industry. Along with the fission products that remain radioactive and dangerous for anything between 8 days and several thousand years, some substances such as plutonium must be completely isolated from the environment for 250,000 years. Considering that known human history stretches back no more than 10,000 years, this period of time begins to look very long indeed. And with plutonium there can be no mistakes; it is the most dangerous substance known to mankind, 100,000 times more toxic than the most potent carcinogen. A single pound of plutonium contains the potential to cause 42 billion lung cancers. A single CANDU reactor produces several hundred pounds of the substance every year.

Some also argue that the flurry among the experts to find a permanent dumpsite for nuclear wastes is not as genuine as they might have us believe since the exigencies of the industry are such that we will be led into plutonium recycling by the end of the century. At present rates of use, the world uranium supply will last thirty to forty years. But even many of the adamant promoters of the nuclear industry worry about the drift toward plutonium recycling. All the attempts to reprocess to date have been fraught with difficulties and accidents. A reprocessing industry would make plutonium, the fuel for atomic bombs, readily accessible for terrorists or the leaders of aggressive regimes. In order to protect the world against escalating nuclear proliferation, every citizen would have to relinquish many civil liberties. Our whole civilization could be turned into a security stronghold.

Moreover, the wastes from plutonium recycling would be even more deadly than those from the "once-through" system since they would occur in liquid form. Because of the properties of liquid that allow it to seep, flow and go into solution, these radioactive wastes represent a greater threat to our soil and water systems.

But some critics would say that we are going at the problem all wrong, looking as we are here simply at its tail end: first we should solve the serious and significant problems that occur from the mining and milling of uranium. At present 80 million tons of uranium ore tailing are lying exposed to the air and leaching into the soil and Serpentine River system at Elliot Lake. By the year 2000 this amount will have grown to several million tons. Disposal of these low-level wastes is almost more difficult than for high-level wastes because of the volumes involved in any case, the disturbance caused them by the ore crushing process has already induced them to release their radon gas, a heavy and poisonous gas that travels close to the ground and spreads in measurable concentrations for up to a thousand miles from the mine site. A U.A. study maintains that more than a thousand cancer deaths a year will be directly attributable to radon gas build-ups by the year 2000.

The negligence of the authorities in dealing with low-level radioactive wastes is evidenced by the situation in Port Hope. In the 1950's the townspeople used mill-ends from Eldorado Nuclear for landfill, and were not informed of the dangers involved until the matter came to public attention in 1974-75. The clean-ups that have taken place have not been entirely satisfactory. Radioactive sites are still being identified in Port Hope this year.

But safety is only one of the aspects of the nuclear industry that needs to be reconsidered. It now seems that cost may be a major factor in the slow-down in the nuclear program. The costs of building a nuclear power plant have skyrocketed in the past few years. When Darlington station (40 miles east of Toronto) was first planned it was thought possible to complete it for less than $2 Billion, now the final cost is projected at closer to $5 Billion. In 1977, Hydro was planning to borrow $30 Billion over the next 22 years in order to keep pace with its planned program of nuclear expansion. Treasurer Darcy McKeough noted that "based on present estimates Ontario Hydro requirements will exceed our access to North American capital by 1980".

Significantly, McKeough's response to this situation was not to dampen Hydro's demands but rather to suggest that funds be diverted from other Ontario government programs to Hydro's coffers. Considering that it costs a $100,000 capital investment to create one job in the nuclear industry, compared to an investment of one-fifth this amount in manufacturing and one-twentieth this amount in textiles, it would seem that the most beneficial focus for our funds might lie elsewhere in this period of high unemployment. Some nuclear critics argue that costs alone will soon bring the nuclear industry staggering to its knees.

Ontario Hydro has justified its massive commitment in funds and energy to nuclear power on the basis of need. It managed to obtain an Environmental Assessment exemption for Darlington, its present nuclear construction, on the grounds that Ontario would face dire shortages of electricity by the mid-1980's if a delay were caused by public hearings. Since the exemption a two-year delay for Darlington has been announced due to lack of funds. Yet we haven't heard much about projected shortages lately. In fact, quite the contrary. In January, it was announced that Hydro generating capacity for the month of December, the peak-use period, was consistently 25% above Ontario's needs with surpluses occasionally reaching 40%

Douglas Point nuclear station - in operation since 1967

Hydro has been rushing to find American buyers for its excess power, not only for this year but well into the 1980's. Also in January it was announced that Wesleyville, an oil-fired generating station under construction, would be mothballed, despite the losses of about $600 million.

Do we need Darlington, and do we need the additional 13,000 megawatts—about 4 more Darlington's—that Hydro is currently

if a reactor goes, you have a catastrophe

insisting we must have by the year 2000? Is it true that Ontario will be "shivering in the dark" if Hydro takes time out to rethink its nuclear expansion program? In fact some calculate that even with the rates of growth proposed by Hydro, Darlington will not be needed until 1990. And more significantly, Hydro's forecasted rates of growth of our electricity use have been out by several percentage points every year since 1973-74. Moreover, if real conservation measures were undertaken by the Ontario government and the people of Ontario, we could save as much energy between now and the year 2000 as Darlington will be able to produce. As it is we use twice as much electricity as people in Sweden do, and Swedes share a level of GNP per capita comparable to our own. We also use twice as much electricity today in Ontario as we did 14 years ago. Are our lives really twice as good now as in 1967? When we add these deliberations to the reckoning that 4x as many jobs are created by conservation development as by nuclear power, it seems other options might be worth considering.

The decision about whether to push ahead on the path of nuclear development and expansion in this country is one that must be faced by all of us. We have been told in a report by the independent Paris-based Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development that the program of public participation in energy matters in Canada woefully lags behind such programs in Western Europe. Up until now the debate about nuclear energy has been confined to the experts. Since the decision will have such serious economic, political and social consequences, it is one that we cannot leave up to the technical experts. It is their job to provide unbiased facts; it is our job to determine our energy future. We must all begin to consider the kind of society we would like to live in and the steps to get there from where we are now. It is time to educate ourselves, recall the power we have in the past delegated to politicians and experts, and accept our personal responsibilities for the world we live in.

Six Characters: the final bow

Patricia Lavioire

Last week the Queen's Drama Department provided the University community with some fascinating drama. Their production of Luigi Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author" was the strongest of the department's productions this year.

While the audience filtered into the theatre and settled down for the performance people were tidying things up on stage in preparation for a rehearsal. The actors gradually moved into the theatre from its back doors and from backstage. The rehearsal began to take shape with the arrival of the director. The audience's attention was gradually attained and then at once captured with the appearance of the Six Characters who lifelessly formed a striking tableau.

The urgency of their existence and the desperation of their drama was expressed by the Six Characters in an incisive physical manner. They were dressed in mid 20's fashion, without the crispness of imitative period costume, as though they were lifted from an attic and placed on stage without being dusted off. The mourning dress of the Mother, Stepdaughter, Boy, and Child extended itself beyond the expression of grief over the death of the non-existent Lover/Father, to the mourning of their own existence. This desperation was furthered by articulate posture and gesture.

The mother, erect, head turned slightly to avoid direct confrontation, worked her fingers compulsively, almost shredding her handkerchief in her agony at reliving the drama.

The daughter, fallen but proud, also stood straight, her resentment and anger evident in the fists often clenched by her sides. Her derisive laughter horrified the Father and irritated the Company.

The boy dressed in grey, was faded, overshadowed by his sister and her disgust for him, and he lurked rather than stood, forever watching and listening, arousing suspicion in all who observed him (for he did not speak). His hands languished at his sides.

The child, innocent yet sombre in the shadow of her ever-imminent death, at one point manipulated a doll dressed in black.

The Father struggled against the stoop of age, his shoulders forward as he carried the weight of his drama. His hands interpreted his agitation. Held above the waist in front, they punctuated his dialogue and sketched his words in the air. His mouth moved quickly and furiously at times as he tried to express the exigency of the family.

This juxtaposition of the actors who felt comfortable in each others' presence and who moved leisurely through their rehearsal, alongside the characters who were caught up in a private compelling drama, and who related to each other in an inescapable love-hate atmosphere, was the crux of the conflict which gave the production its dynamism.

The audience was given the impression that the technical side of the production was as spontaneous as the play within the play. Iris, in the lighting booth, followed the instructions of "The Director", Peter Palmer, to a tee, creating for example, "sleazy bedroom light" for

The Son was gaunt and bowed, withdrawn and yet aggressive. At one point he clutched from behind at the bars of the headboard of the bed as he watched his father and half-sister play out their part of the tragedy.

The director of "Six Characters in Search of an Author", Fred Euringer, is responsible for the precise animation of the Six Characters. He adeptly created a stark contrast between the "Six Characters" and the "Actors of the Company" who seemed to be only casually interested in their rehearsal and somewhat skeptical of the play they were working on, Pirandello's "Mixing it Up".

The scene in the room at Madame Pace's house of ill repute. Truly, the properties mistress, managed to conjure up all the appropriate props for the rehearsal of the Characters' play. In this way, Euringer reminded the audience that they were still in a theatre. However, during the scenes of the Six Characters' drama in which they were allowed to act without interruption, this identification of locale was lost and yet another dichotomy was created.

Of the play as a whole the most outstanding feature was the fine quality of acting. The focal point of the performances of the Six Characters was Derek Sewell's portrayal of the Father. Exhausting speeches and shows of a broad range of emotions were handled superbly. Particularly pleasing was the role of the child as played Amanda Euringer. Her quiet presence was handled with surprisingly mature poise.

The Queen's Drama Department has had an immensely successful year, perhaps the best in recent memory. "Six Characters in Search of an Author" has concluded the season in brilliant style.

Celebration

Julian Cunningham

Mr. Rich is bored. He is bored with life. He is bored with himself. He is old and bored. In fact he is so bored that he sings about his boredom in a song appropriately titled "Bored."

This is the beginning of Celebration, opening tomorrow night and running through Saturday in Duncan MacArthur Auditorium. Mr. Rich ("I haven't had an erection for twenty-five years") comes duly under the influence of three characters who carry him back to vitality in this delightful Broadway musical by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt. They also wrote "The Fantasticks", America's longest running play — ever.

Celebration, set on New Year's Eve, playfully explores the rituals of birth and rebirth. This production features a masked chorus of eighteen, flesh-coloured body costumes, and high comedy mixed with provocative dance and songs. An up tempo night of pure rousing fun.

Celebration is a joint presentation of the MacArthur Student Society and MacArthur Dramatic Arts. R. Gordon White directs with the assistance of choreographer Kathryn Russell and musical director Steven Coldridge. Curtain time for all shows is 8:30 p.m., and reduced prices on Wednesday.

Baldry brings it back

Eric Evans

It had been spring time in the student ghetto for several days when Long John Baldry came back to Kingston. This may have had an influence on the concert's atmosphere.

The doors opened at 7.30, with the back up band, High Street, starting at nine. As an experiment, and due to the "nature" of the music, QEA arranged for the concert to be licensed. The back up band would probably have been popular in the pub, but the audience Wednesday night seemed more interested in drinking draught than listening to any band besides Long John's.

Long John Baldry finally (with emphasis on finally) took the stage at 11.30. By this time, most members of the audience were, to be conservative, smashed. Long John could probably have played anything and he would have been received ecstatically. He did, however, play his usual brand of very wild, raunchy and totally enjoyable, not-inciting music.

Roy Young abused his piano very satisfactorily, and the vocals of Kathi MacDonald left one wondering where a woman of her size can find the depth and power that her voice has—especially with "Heartbreak Hotel". As for Long John, he somehow looked natural in his skin-tight zebra striped body suit, hammering out songs from his albums.

By itself, the concert must be reviewed in positive terms, but in comparison to Baldry's debut in Kingston at Alfie's earlier in the year, there was something missing. Perhaps the eagerness of the crowd for a repeat performance hindered the spontaneity that made the night in the pub so unique. Certainly Jock Hartly Arena and a much larger crowd did not help much to recreate the atmosphere.

However, when the band stopped playing about one o'clock, the people dancing on the tables showed they wanted more. The band was cheered and stomped back for a half-hour long rendition of "Don't Lay No Boogie-Woogie on the King of Rock and Roll". It is hard to describe the sight of a thousand people dancing and jumping up and down on the tables on which we usually write exams, but it certainly was interesting.

Ensemble sings of peace

Queen's Choral Ensemble under director Denise Narcisse-Mair will present its only full concert of this academic year in Grant Hall on Saturday, March 31 at 8.30 p.m. (Admission free).

Two powerful works, both written in time of war, and both pleas for peace, constitute the program. The first, DONA NOBIS PACEM, was composed during the second World War by English composer Vaughan Williams on an eclectic series of texts.

The final work MASS IN D MINOR was also composed in time of war by Joseph Haydn, who titled it MISSA IN ANGUSTIIS, or freely translated - MASS IN TIME OF FEAR. The work has also become known as the NELSON MASS, for it was completed just before the historic naval battle at Abukir from which Nelson emerged as the triumphant victor.

In May of last year the Choral Ensemble undertook a tour of Europe where performances in Holland, Germany, Austria and Hungary received invariably high praise.

Queen's best: Variety and talent

Staff

Playing its own part in the rites of spring, Queen's will be putting some of its finest musical talents on display April first at the Queen's Best concert. Twelve acts (selected out of 34 that auditioned) will take the stage in Grant Hall this Sunday to entertain their fellow students and raise money in support of Camp Outlook.

Comedy, drama, folk, and good ol' rock 'n roll will be the order of the evening. Robert S. Campbell, veteran of 'Sobriety', 'Applause', and 'Six Characters...' will be the emcee.

Outgoing AMS president Dave Brown accompanied by Brian Sawyers will attempt to prove his talents extend beyond politics to comedy and music. (Infamous for his campaign promises and refreshment stands Terry "Veg" Reynolds may surprise some with his handling of the ivory keys and Andy Simon returns with a new three piece band to play up-beat folk.

Anyone who remembers last year's concert will be happy to hear Barb Crook, Andy MacBean and Sarah Cunningham will be back.

Even new wave fans should be satisfied with one of the newcomers, an eight person band called the Operators will play their enthusiastic renditions of songs by Elvis Costello and the Cars.

If you like good music, kids, or just need a break, be sure to see Queen's Best.

Concert evokes mixed reactions

Murray McLauchlan

Jim Cormier

If it wasn't for some of the most moving expressions of working class blues this side of the 49th parallel, I could have sworn that it was not Murray McLauchlan but George Carlin on stage Sunday night.

McLauchlan, as well as being incredibly moving was outrageously funny throughout the concert. Throwing out indelicate references to "pimpmobiles", "turd" and "puking", he broke through the boundaries of good taste and drew more than enough belly laughs to justify his naughtiness.

Musically, his performance deserves a slew of superlatives. Accompanied only by his long-time bass player Dennis Pendrith, he spiritedly re-worked many of his album arrangements and, therefore, more than compensated for the absence of the rest of the Silver Tractors. "Carmelita", a Warren Zevon number, was lent a new poignancy by a slow piano treatment. Gripping use of dynamics powered a haunting version of "Boulevard". The stark instrumentation of "Train Song", harmonica wailing out that old train whistle, evoked feelings of loss and loneliness, easily eclipsing the song's effect on the album.

Songs from his newest album, "Somebody's Long Lonely Night", "Highway One", "Nassau Town", and "Whispering Rain", were more faithful to the album versions and all were enthusiastically received.

"Hard Rock Town", a tough rocker on album, was delivered in a country beat and inspired some zealous handclapping. Considering that the song is a bitter realization of the plight of people in an industrial town, where "kids are spitting in the high school halls", I found this cheerful response stupidly incongruous with the song's message. Later, though, McLauchlan hinted that perhaps partying through life's problems constitutes a healthy attitude. He lead the audience in a rollicking sing-song version of a song whose message is hardly cause for elation: "You Can't Win". As the audience chanted out "you can't win", to the mischievous vocal prompting of McLauchlan, the moment seemed to epitomize the curious mixture of heart-ache and hilarity that was the concert's mood.

"Agatha" fails miserably

A blast from the Past

Mark Henderson

Agatha represents a throwback to the old days of American movie making. Its theme is concise and straightforward: Without men, women are thrown into a state of crisis for which the solitary solution is death. In the 1930's and 40's, the fragile female who couldn't cope with success or responsibility was a hot topic in Hollywood; especially at Warner Brothers, a studio which excelled in "Women's Films", an archaic genre that was ultimately guilty of melodramatic overkill.

Starring Vanessa Redgrave and Dustin Hoffman, Agatha delivers us a blast from the past that simply reeks of smug artiness, and a patronizing attitude that settles for easy answers and crudely reaffirms the ideological myths of a dead age. Director Michael Apted has constructed a movie that would have made D W Griffith cringe!

Vanessa Redgrave portrays the legendary Agatha Christie - banal mystery writer extraordinaire - in an "imaginary solution to a real story". There is little validity or even plausibility involved, only a petty drama about Mrs. Christie's marriage break-up, painful withdrawal into a masochistic, painless world, and the heart throbbing attempts of an ex-cruciatingly famous journalist (Dustin Hoffman) to give her hope and support. While the movie tries to maintain a high degree of emotional intensity, it is trapped within the repressive confines of a sub-standard narrative style I hoped had been quietly forgotten and buried. Bette Davis and Joan Crawford would have blushed!

Hoffman and Redgrave are two of the most accomplished performers in the movie industry today. In their own way, they have taken an uncompromising stance against Hollywood blandness, often acting in roles expressing unpopular viewpoints. It is doubly surprising then, to find them in such a vulgar exercise as Agatha. Hoffman is locked into a role that merely requires him to act cool and professional: A dedicated journalist who has chosen the typewriter over marriage. Only briefly, in a scene when he shyly asks Mrs. Christie to dance, does the character allow him to display his considerable talents. Redgrave must constantly look lost and heart broken, as a woman with no identity without a man. Her stereotyped role reflects the narrow attitudes of chauvinistic boorishness our grandparents were weaned on.

Mainstream movie making has occasionally proven it can turn out more enlightened and entertaining products than Agatha, or at least something with a better script and direction. Pretty photography and sets aren't enough to save Agatha from oblivion. It's got to be one of the worst films to come to Kingston in, oh...at least a month or two.

Reggae: One World with music

Brent Lavictore

Last week Dollar Bills featured the music of Ernie Smith and the Roots Revival, one of the newest and fastest rising reggae bands in North America. In one short sentence their performance was brilliant, combining original material with the established classics by Bob Marley and

Jimmy Cliff in a show filled with the zaniness of a Max Webster concert. This is a summation of an 'interview' I had with Ernie and his band Thursday afternoon. I hesitate to use the word because it was anything but an interview. It was an afternoon of religious revelation. Over a background of taped reggae, Ernie spoke slowly, patiently, punctuating his speech with long pauses and grasping gestures attempting to explain to me the elusive force behind the reggae rhythm. What follows is a conversation about the One World, One Love concept so vital to reggae music.

Ernie Smith at Dollar Bills

(pointing to tape recorder), are no two different atoms. The structure might be different, but it's the same series, you know. We're supposed to just think, and then set yourself to a certain vibration and, "become the air" (laugh). Do you understand?

Natural laws and the purity of thought - You don't sin until you know sin...

...This is the rhythm we must all tap. This is the rhythm we use and feel, we tap into it, for reggae. At once we are all receivers and transmitters for the rhythm.

I believe in the natural goodness of all men

Reggae is indigenous. It was always there. Reggae is the spirit of the people. Through different periods, it showed itself in various forms, you know. Reggae is really the "music" of Jamaica. Like, you got the primitive cult rhythms: Cumina, Pokimana, Junkano, all those coming back from religious rites and seasons and ceremonies, and you got work songs and all that. And reggae now, as we see it, as you see it, is a commercial distillation of that thing.

Country music is as close as you get here to an indigenous music. The third world is dealing with history. They bring a very historical impact to their music and they show you history is still happening before your eyes. They have songs like "Why is this Buying and Selling Still Going On?" and there's a lot of things that still haven't changed, and they won't for a long time. Just faces have changed; like in Jamaica, the faces changed from white to black in parliament and everybody thought we were free. (laugh) You know. And we grew up thinking we were free people. Everyone running around, so tired. And they think they're free. Sooner or later they're gonna see what's happening; they'll see. They just don't want to deal with what's happening. One by one, people are gonna wake up. So they're just gonna drop out.

People go around, living their lives, you know, just with blinds on. We get preoccupied with material existence, and we forget that this is a part of life, a part of forever. This is a speck of forever in our threescore and ten years or whatever. We gotta try and see our existence here in the context of an eternal existence.

The rhythm is the foundation. Rhythm is a code. The drum is a computer, understand. The drum has all our history, all our confused history, all that we can't know and can't find out; it's in the drums; it's all there. Rhythm is the foundation of our creation.

Do you realize that the smallest particles of matter are round. And the biggest heavenly bodies are round. And the space between the biggest heavenly bodies and the smallest particles of matter is the same space. It's the oneness of all creation.

All is one. We are a part of the world's forces. We have the capacity to tap all the natural laws that exist, the natural laws that science uses, right. The natural laws that were here before science. We are a part of it. Our nervous and electronic systems are a part of it. We are "the force" (laugh)

Bews wrap-up

Mark Pentland

For this, the second to last Bews News of 1978-79, I have asked all the Athletic Sticks to submit a list of the highlights for their particular unit in the past year. Unfortunately, I did not receive a note from everyone, however, I will attempt to summarize those that I did receive.

Tom Walsh reports that Arts 80 moved from being the doormat of Bews last year to a strong ninth place finish in the standings this year. Arts 80 won two championships this year - one in Water Polo and the other in the Swim Meet. Participation this year in both team sports and individual sports was the highest it has ever been for Arts 80. Their Basketball, Curling, Innertube and Hockey teams all advanced to the play-offs with the Basketball team advancing to the finals against Meds.

Meds enjoyed its most successful year ever under the direction of Ken Appleby. In first term Meds won the Harrier and the Track and Field Meet. They placed a team in the play-offs in all of the outdoor sports, and provided the opposition to Commerce 79 in the Softball final. Meds had a strong second term, with championships in Bowling, Basketball and Hockey. Their strong Water Polo season was lost in the closely matched final with Arts 80. Again, participation was superb for Meds this year and together with the championships they captured this year, a most successful year was had.

Commerce 80 continued to improve this year. Although their only championship came in Innertube Water Polo, (this was the second year in a row that they have dominated the sport) Mike Borden notes that thirty-four people turned out to the Harrier in the fall, compared to less than five in the past two years. Participation was excellent in the Swim Meet, Track Meet and Cross-Country Meet, and Mike extends his thanks to the Commerce 80 men for their participation this year.

Rick Bond summarizes his unit's fantastic year with two interesting notes. Commerce 81 moved from last year's 14th place to this year's 8th place finish. Throughout the season they provided the opposition in two finals of two Bews sports: Soccer and Basketball. The Hockey team and Water Polo squad also enjoyed strong seasons. Rick acknowledges the strong turnouts for the Harrier, Relays and Swim Meet and is confident that Comm 81 will continue to be strong next year.

Win Kennedy and John Sinclair, co-sticks of Arts 82 did an excellent job with that unit. The Hockey team, Ball Hockey team and Volleyball team all managed to make post season play. The Soccer, Water Polo, and Cross-Country squads also had good seasons. Arts 82 has just begun and both Win and John feel that it's been a very promising beginning. Many thanks go to all those who supported Arts 82 this past year.

Civil displayed their Ball Hockey supremacy by defeating PHE in the final. Although no other team sport championships were claimed by Civil, they were runners up in the Innertube and Tug-o-war. Scott White reports that only three teams failed to make the play-offs. Civil's Rick Hamel dominated the racquet sports with strong performances in Squash, Paddleball and Racquetball, while Jim Tully and Peter Yee placed second in the doubles Badminton. Civil had a super year and Scott White appreciates the support he received.

PHE had another super year on their way to their third consecutive Bews Championship. They received titles in Tug-o-war, Rugby, Golf, Team Handball, Singles and Doubles Handball. Adam Riggins attributes much of the success this year to the outstanding participation from the first year people. He anticipates another championship quest next year.

Mechanical won the John Paul participation race this year for the second time. In fact, Mech achieved the highest point total ever recorded in the John Paul. When asked about his unit's performance over the year, Mech Stick merely said "Mechanical is the greatest!"

What else can I say???

Colour Night caps an outstanding athletic year

Staff

Queen's University culminated its finest intercollegiate athletic year ever with the honouring of its athletes at Colour Night last Thursday evening at the Bartlett Gymnasium.

Masters of Ceremonies for the event Bev Webb and Joe Schnitker opened the proceedings with the introduction of special guests including Principal R.L. Watts who gave a tribute to this year's athletes. The reply on behalf of the athletes was given by Mark Bennett, a member of the Queen's Soccer Team.

Following the presentation of "Q's" plaques and "Special bars", six Special plaques were presented to athletes honoured as outstanding players or for exceptional services to Queen's Athletics. Recipients of Special Plaques were Mary Brunton, basketball; Scott Scheuermann, fencing; Laurie Gallagher, field hockey; Tim Dennis, swimming; Karen Rahn, track and field; and Biraj Bora, volleyball.

The highlight of the evening was the presentation of the school's major athletic awards. Winners of the Allie Pierce Trophy awarded annually to the male student and female student who contribute most to intercollegiate athletics in their first year were Chris Bowby of the field hockey and nordic ski teams and Jack Fraleigh of the swim team.

The Award of Merit presented to the female athlete who best exemplifies the qualities of leadership, sportsmanship, dedication and all-round consistency was won by Janean Sargent, the Captain of the Queen's Golden Gals hockey team.

Tim Dennis of the men's swimming team capped a memorable evening by being presented the Jack Jarvis Trophy awarded to the outstanding graduating student in intercollegiate individual sports.

The PHE '55 Alumnae Trophy awarded to the final year woman student for both scholastic and athletic achievement was presented to Sheryl Keely of the curling team.

Climaxing the evening was the presentation of the Jenkins Trophy awarded to the male student who has brought most honour to Queen's by his athletic and scholastic ability. Duncan Card, a top intercollegiate sprinter and Adam Schoemaker an outstanding cross country and distance runner were named co-winners. Card accepted the award for both athletes as Shoemaker, member of the Canadian cross country team, is competing in Limerick, Ireland at an international meet.

Basketball officiating criticized

Marc Gagnon

"A particular player practices two hours a day to refine and perfect his skills, a referee just shows up for the games."

This particular column is not a condemnation of refereeing or a "sour grapes story." It is an objective view of refereeing in the OUAA Basketball League.

In minor Baseball and Hockey umpires and referees are trained and schooled in a manner befitting a professional. Do college basketball referees attend such clinics? In my opinion if they do it is with the aid of a canine and a white cane.

The calibre of officiating is not equal to the calibre of play in the OUAA Basketball League. The OUAA had the number one ranked team in the country (York). Does the OUAA have the number one ranked referee? I do not think so. There is no parity.

The Maritimes are the power in basketball at this point in time. The Maritimes refereeing has developed in proportion to the calibre of play (I made this observation having played in both conferences). This is a direct contrast to the OUAA situation.

What is the cause of this contrast?

The Maritime Universities (i.e. St. Mary's, St. F.X., Acadia) are primarily responsible for the high calibre of officiating. As the Universities upgraded their respective basketball programs they made sure an equality with refereeing was achieved.

At one time there were numerous referees in the AUAA (Atlantic Universities Athletic Association) with limited officiating talent.

This soon changed until there were a select group of excellent referees.

In 1978 the Canadian Basketball Championships took place in Halifax with two Maritime referees and two Maritime basketball teams (Acadia, St. Mary's).

This two-fold victory, that of officiating and players was a culmination of dedication and hard work. (league officials, referees, coaches and players) I feel the OUAA Basketball League can achieve a similar success story. However, a lot of hard work is required.

Will amateur officials be willing to make the necessary sacrifices in the pursuit of excellence? For OUAA Basketball's sake, I hope so.

West proves best in Inter-residence sports

The Inter-Residence sports season wound to a close last Sunday with Jean Royce winning both the hockey and basketball championships, defeating McNeill and Brockington respectively. On the strength of these two titles and their earlier victories in football (over McNeill) and Volleyball (over Brockington), Jean Royce will also receive the Frank Tindall Cup for the best over-all standing in inter-residence sports. This marks the end of a long period of domination by McNeill.

As a new addition this season to the existing six team league on Leonard Field, the teams from West Campus were a far cry from those of four years ago which were forced to withdraw due to lack of consistent support.

Rod Bush, the LFRS Sports Coordinator, attributed the unmatched sweep of all four sports by a "new franchise" to the hard work of the Senior Residents who organized the Jean Royce program this year. "Dooley F. Goumeniouk and John Sullivan have done a fine job implementing a new program out there, and they deserved to win", Bush commented.

When asked about the significance of graduate students on the teams, Goumeniouk retorted, "Anyone who cries about education students playing is probably just a sore loser. We had a total of four grad students out of 75 on four teams. And besides, the first year kids are fresh out of high school and in better shape."

The seven team inter-residence league is sponsored by the LFRS and involves over 300 students, including their own coaches and officials. In the past, sports have been limited to football in the fall, and basketball and hockey in the winter, but due to the response to volleyball this year it will likely be included in the sports menu next year.

But, for this year at least, as the boys at Jean Royce put it, "West is best".

Autonomy needed

Considerable debate has arisen in the last few years over the proper role of the student press in Canada. Recently, it has moved to discussion of the means by which student newspapers are financed and guaranteed editorial and content autonomy.

The 1978-1979 academic year has seen an increase in interference in both these areas by student governments. On the financial side, papers such as the McGill Daily and the University of Lethbridge Meliorist have been forced to cease publication for short periods as a result of either insufficient funds as set out by politician-dominated publications boards, or student council attempts to withhold the student levy earmarked for the university newspaper.

Most recently, the University of Manitoba Students Union Election Committee attempted to censor the Manitoban for publishing, during a March re-election campaign, charges levelled against the UMSU President in the preceding fall. It was felt that publication of these charges would be detrimental to his campaign and should be held until after the election was over.

These examples clearly outline the need for financial and editorial autonomy of the student press. Without such autonomy student government can effectively circumvent the role of the press as watchdog and critic of student politics, thereby denying the university community a crucial forum of opinion and debate.

An autonomous press is fundamental to the principle of responsible government at any level. These recent attempts by student councils to exert undue influence over the content of student newspapers is in direct contravention of this principle.

Harsher reality

If it weren't for the intentions of the Ontario Government, the AMS Committee studying the recently-released P.S. Ross Report should probably pack up and go home. The report itself, a highly speculative and unrigorous piece of research, does not deserve the time spent. Unfortunately, it appears that the government may well base its proposed tuition policy changes on one of the models the report cites. Of the three that are constructed, the one most likely to be selected involves an indexing of fees to costs; a greater flexibility on the part of universities to set their own fees-based, apparently, on what the market will bear—and allowing greater differentials in fees between departments.

All these proposals would have a dramatic impact upon the ability of low-income students to carry the cost of education. The government has not indicated in what ways it would alter the student-aid program to balance these adverse effects, and until it does, the Committee should reserve judgement. Rather than commenting on the report before Outer Council, it should demand from the government an elaboration of the Ross model to include proposed changes in OSGP. Arguing pro or con, prior to formulating a complete package of proposals is spurious.

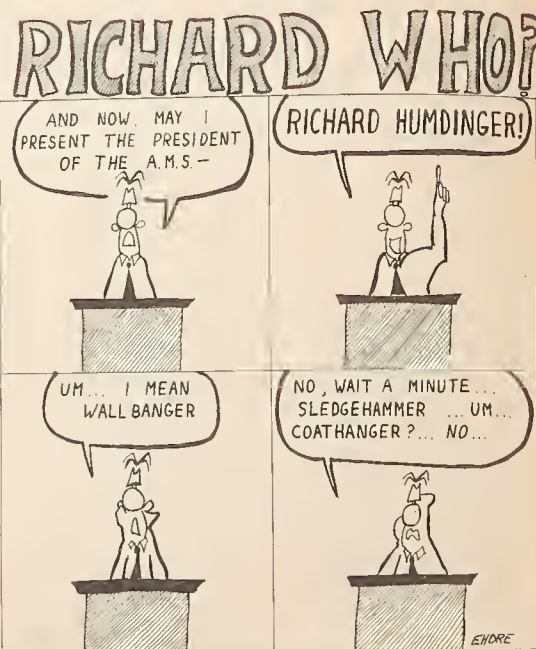

Changes such as this report envisages may well be necessary. If so, then measures must be built in that, at the very least, ensure constant levels of low-income student enrolment. Without these guarantees, the harsh reality of financial restraint will be met at the cost of universal access to higher education: and that is a much harsher reality.

Bette is off the mark

When Bette Stephenson came to Queen's recently, she repeated a common Ontario Government theme. A greater proportion of university revenues, she pined, should consist of donations from alumni. Grads, having reaped the benefits of their education, should put something back into the system so that others may follow in their footsteps — or so the argument goes.

Such grandiose charity schemes sound quite idyllic, but they don't, won't, and shouldn't work. All too often, alumni permanently sever their ties with their alma mater. And they can never be held accountable for doing so. The government, on the other hand, now has a financial responsibility that it cannot shirk; it must ensure the maintenance of high educational standards and universal access. To attempt to pass this responsibility onto an unaccountable group is unsanctionable, irresponsible and unfortunately very typical.

Grads may well have some responsibility to donate to their university. But that responsibility can only be construed as secondary to that belonging to the government.

Council votes for unpegging fees

Doug Ronson

Outer Council moved last Thursday that the Ontario government adopt a policy of allowing universities to set their own tuition fees.

Council adopted this motion 14 to 12 despite the fact that it has been widely criticized, particularly by the OFS, as it could lead to high priced universities for the rich and low priced universities for the poor.

The proposal is one of several alternative tuition models outlined in the P.S. Ross Report on Tuition. The Ontario government is expected to adopt one of these models within the next two years.

Hugh Christie defended the proposal, saying that improvements in OSAP could ensure university accessibility to those from low income backgrounds.

However, former AMS President Dave Brown attacked the idea. "I very much doubt that the catchphrase 'OSAP will pick up the slack' will solve the problem of accessibility," he said. He noted that OSAP has had a great number of problems in recent years and said that if universities charge different fees it would further complicate the program.

Queen's is currently in high demand and would be able to set higher fees. However, the OFS has stated that such a policy might lead to drastic underfunding and perhaps even closure of smaller universities such as Brock and Trent.

Christie, however, did not believe that such a situation is likely to occur. "It is not clear that it is economic reality that there will be huge fee differentials between universities," he said.

"If we allow universities to set different fees we are protecting excellence by allowing the better universities to set higher fees," Christie said.

Hugh Dodd attacked the proposal describing it as elitist, and law.

Representative Peter Doody also opposed the motion, saying that allowing universities to set their own fees leaves no one publicly accountable for the quality of education in Ontario.

"If we support the option of allowing universities to set their own fees we are saying that it is all right to institute an elitist university system financed by the monetary aristocracy," to Doody said.

Council also passed a motion advising the government not to adopt differential fees by program.

One option of the Ross Report suggests that program fees be linked to costs or to demand for that program. A report to Council said that tuition fees of $2500 for such programs as Medicine would prevent universal accessibility, especially considering that OSAP is not currently available for graduate studies. "Queen's students do not wish to see a university system where only the rich can afford to enroll in profession and graduate studies," the report said.

ASUS split over grants

Rick Emmerson

ASUS awarded Cathy Lawrence, an Arts student $500 on March 27 to participate in "Operation Drake", this summer after formally deciding that all applications requesting immediate financial assistance would be deferred until September.

At the ASUS executive meeting of March 23, Kevin Friesen, President, called the committee's attention to ASUS funding policy in response to recent applications. Although not a formal part of the constitution, it was decided that in order to facilitate equal access to compete for grants, all applications would be deferred until September.

At the same meeting, ASUS Secretary, Rick Pearson, submitted a plea to make an exception in the cases of the World University Student Council, Canadian Crossroads International and Duncan Card, as their applications required immediate attention. Pearson was informed that no such exceptions would be made, which he subsequently told the applicants.

For this reason, their applications were not included on the agenda of the ASUS assembly of March 27. However, at this meeting, Friesen successfully put forward a motion to award the $500 grant to Lawrence. Friesen told the Journal, "I felt that her case was an exception which required immediate discussion."

Pearson said, "What is at dispute are not the merits of Ms. Lawrence's application, but that all applicants did not receive equal attention." He has demanded a special meeting to discuss the grants, April 3.

Deb MacLeod
Glenn Smith, External Affairs
Commissioner

Glenn Smith, External Affairs Commissioner, outlined problems of the past and areas where he hopes to make improvements.

When asked about his commission's relationship with the OFS, Smith said, "Basically, we agree with the OFS, but we're also working on our own individual stance to the P.S. Ross report." Smith had little to add to Richard Binhammer's post-election statement that the OFS will have to "shape up" or Queen's would "Ship out."

For next year's budget, "the largest amount is spent on conferences and lobbies, a fair amount is spent on the Queen's-Laval project." The project itself will be continued, "as long as it's not thrown out by Outer Council."

Now that a great deal of budget work has been done and a better line of communication has been established with Laval, Smith said the Project was "still viable", but results would remain to be seen.

The "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner" programme hasn't been too successful this year, although it was in its first year of 1977-78. Smith attributed problems to several reasons.

"The person at City Hall wasn't doing a very good job. It's a basic lack of communication, with the fundamental people dragging their heels. It's also a publicity factor."

Smith summed up his commission, "It's more of a people's commission than a monies commission. It involves two-way communication, including communicating the fact that we're available and making ourselves available."

Birchard hopes to be able to work out any "bureaucratic delays" with the housing service, and improving tenant/university relationships. The two-year tenancy policy of the previous QSA director, Sheila Murray, will still be followed.

He said his agency will be working on "a new pub atmosphere for Alfie's, including a new logo and graphic design for the menu." There's also a possibility of extending the hours of the McLaughlin Room Pub on afternoons.

Regarding the Tricolor Bus service, Birchard said he'll be "working with the new manager, Brian Hendry, to check out the feasibility of stops at other places during special times of the year."

Since students have been asking for a Tricolour bus to Peterborough, he said this may be possible at times such as Christmas and Reading Week, depending upon their budget. He added that the price for Tricolour service may not be going up, but this would also remain to be seen from the budget.

the AMS orientation. It is usually managed by the Campus Activities Commissioner.

"The big thing right now is working out the film policy on campus," Williamson said. With recent conflict in bookings, a policy will be worked out which is "fair to everyone."

John Williamson

Williamson went further to state that as under the AMS Constitution, the QEA's "responsibility will be directly to me". It has always been that way. This seems to contradict the fact that the Board of Directors has had management of the QEA recently.

Earlier there was a "conflict of interest" concerning Williamson's organization of AMS orientation in 1979, but that "has been looked after," he said.

As he will be serving on ASUS orientation, it was decided that Richard Binhammer would handle

Deb MacLeod
Clayton Jaeger, Education Commissioner

Jaeger stated that policies which are outlined by the Academic Advisory Board for his commission will be oriented in such a way that he will be able to have more direct input into areas such as student volunteers in Douglas Library.

Discussing several programmes, he said, "My year will consolidate the positions of these programmes rather than create new ones. This way, we'll be able to see which ones have support."

The "Scoop" lecture series have been increasingly successful and will be continued. The new academic year will see four speakers, compared to this year's three. He added that it was the decision of the speaker's commission on which speaker came to Queen's.

Deb MacLeod
Janet Emmett, Internal Affairs
Commissioner

Over this summer, Janet Emmett plans to do "a lot of constitutional review". This, she said, would be a "historical" review, including a general update of all the bylaws.

Janet Emmett

Outer Council has passed this year.

This would allow a committee to be organized to work on such matters as relationships within faculty societies. Emmett added, "The faculty bylaw was a good start" in this direction.

Any policies dealing with AMS constables and the AMS Court will come out in the fall. A court review will take place this summer to make recommendations for areas requiring improvement.

Emmett spoke with optimism for "the very enthusiastic" new Infobank director. Working with the director, Emmett sees improvements to be made to Infobank.

"First, I'd like to centralize it and try to get people to use the University Centre more." This way, she said, more people would become aware of other services offered in the Centre.

Clayton Jaeger

The "Dean's Table" will be continued and will "hopefully get going a little more."

"University Day" will last only one day and will "hopefully run in conjunction with 'Open House'." Jaeger also has plans for a smaller "Future Perspectives."

Mike Birchard

Deb MacLeod
Mike Birchard, QSA Director

When asked about plans for his agency in the upcoming year, Mike Birchard said, "The emphasis is to offer the best possible service keeping our budget in mind." He added that an example of cost control through management will be the "Who's Where", which ran up a deficit of $7300 in the fall of 1978.

Deb MacLeod
John Williamson, Campus Activities
Commissioner

Responding to recent criticism of his commission and rumours of its dissolution, Williamson strongly defended it and said, "I'm sure comments made at Outer Council were facetious."

Williamson went further to state that as under the AMS Constitution, the QEA's "responsibility will be directly to me". It has always been that way. This seems to contradict the fact that the Board of Directors has had management of the QEA recently.

Earlier there was a "conflict of interest" concerning Williamson's organization of AMS orientation in 1979, but that "has been looked after," he said.

AMS budget ratified-Revenue increase projected for next year

Deb MacLeod and John Baktis

The 1979-80 AMS Operating Budget with a revenue totalling $157,095 was ratified by Outer Council last Thursday night. The total projected revenue has increased by $9,605 from last year.

"The budget was made to reflect our priorities," said Jeff Beck, Vice President (Operations). Both Beck and AMS President Richard Binhammer said that they were satisfied with the way the budget has been drawn up.

One issue that came up at Outer Council was the large discrepancy between administrative and commission expenses. Binhammer stated that the difference was a 55:5 and 45:5 ratio. Projected Administrative expenses are $96,780 while Commission expenses are projected at $51,570.

One area of substantial increase are AMS salaries which have gone up by $4,445 to $65,630. Office staff salaries have increased by 6 percent and summer salaries for the President and the two Vice-Presidents have been raised by 5.8 percent.

A major conflict occurred at the meeting when Council turned down the Executive's proposal that the QSA Director be salaried for the summer. He was to have been paid $3,000 for a 17 week period.

Argument also arose concerning the amount allocated for the Administration. It was criticised that more was spent to run the AMS than the students were getting back in Commission services. In response to this, Binhammer stated, "Administrative expenses are part of running the show for the students. Therefore they are a student service."

According to Binhammer and Beck, the commissions should have no trouble financing their services. "In fact we gave the commissions what they wanted or a lot more," said Beck. Binhammer added, "We don't want to throw more money into the commissions than what they need."

One change was the decrease in the Education Commission expenses, down by $450 to $20,880. The reason for this is that last year's Education

Commissioner, Vickie Steele needed capital to initiate several projects. Under this year's commissioner, Clayton Jaeger, no new projects will be started.

The remaining commissions' expenses have been increased. The biggest increase took place in the Internal Affairs Commission, from $12,665 to $16,075. Accounting for much of this increase was the addition of a legal aid position for 13 weeks in the summer.

External Affairs Commission expenses have increased by $1,855 to $9,200, some of this will be used to subsidize Queen's delegates to the OUS Conference in Thunder Bay next fall.

The budget for Campus Activities Commission has increased by $1,380 to $5,225. An increase of $4,500 is attributed to "Upper Year Events", a new activity.

These figures are subject to change at the November Budget Revision.

Queen's University's response to the P.S. Ross report was not discussed in an open meeting of Senate before being sent to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, as was stated in last Tuesday's Journal.

Principal Watts claims to have been misunderstood on this point. "I had no need to take the final draft of the brief back to Senate, as this brief is a submission of the Principal on behalf of the University, not a submission of the Senate. However, I do take such briefs to Senate, to hear their views, and make revisions according to their suggestions. In this case, the Senate had few substantial changes to make."

Gray upset with Arab Boycott

Gray, the first Jewish Canadian cabinet minister said that there is clear evidence that the tough U.S. anti-boycott law has not adversely affected American trade with Arab countries. He cited the fact that Iraq considered to be a "hard-liner", has increased its trade with the United States by fifty percent since the American anti-boycott legislation was introduced.

GATT (The General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade) Mr. Gray recalled the strong resistance of the Canadian government to pressure from the United States against Canadian trade with Cuba and China. The same principle of maintaining our sovereignty over our trade relations should apply to the Arab boycott. This is "not a narrow issue of concern to only one group in this country."

As Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Gray became well known for his efforts at countering the adverse effects of foreign ownership and corporate concentration. He said that the Canadian reaction to the Arab boycott is a manifestation of the same lack of self-confidence of Canadian businesses that has led to the high level of foreign ownership in this country. ## Bitter Grounds reopens in fall

Bitter Grounds will be re-opening next fall after the Engineering Society Council passed a motion to approve its operation from September to December of 1979.

Anne Scott, who will be manager, and Mandy Nottidge, Business Manager, propose to run the Coffee House as a break-even venture, feeling it impossible to make profits otherwise without charging a high admission price. They plan to hold shows on a monthly basis, booking only musicians known to draw a good crowd. "With a monthly show, slightly reduced price, it will be more of an event and draw a better crowd consistently," stated Scott.

In order to cut costs, they have made a contract with an Electrical Engineer to be sound engineer, and plan to continue the policy of having campus talent fill guest sets.

They hope that the renovations being made to Clark Hall will enable them to give the new Bitter Grounds more of a club atmosphere, filling the void created by the closing of this year's Bitter Grounds and the entertainment section of Scarecrow.

The world in Brief

Doug Ronson

Pennsylvania - A nuclear reactor accident at Three Mile Island, Pa., threatened to develop into the most serious nuclear incident in history, outside of weapon testing.

Tuesday a mechanical breakdown caused a release of radio-active steam into the atmosphere. Though the plant was closed down, a hydrogen bubble trapped in the reactor containment system has prevented cooling of the super heated core. Some of the dreaded meltdown had already occurred at press time; more is feared. Should the core meltdown the containment and be exposed, a nuclear catastrophe would be nearly inevitable. President Jimmy Carter is expected to visit the area to calm local fears. The reactor is located in the middle of the Susquehanna River, which flows through much of the heavily populated eastern states.

Ottawa - Prime Minister Trudeau called the long awaited federal election last Monday. The election, to be held May 22, is expected to be a close race between the Liberals and the Conservatives. Some of the important issues in the campaign are national unity, leadership, the economy, energy policy, and medicare.

Washington - A peace accord was reached between Israel and Egypt, ending 30 years of strife between the two countries. The treaty was signed by Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, as well as by U.S. President Jimmy Carter, who is given credit for making the agreement possible. However, many Arab countries opposed the agreement for not giving the Palestinians a guaranteed homeland, and have threatened to invoke economic sanctions against Egypt.

Ottawa - An investigation into the crash of an Air Canada jet last summer has concluded that the accident was due to pilot error. The Department of Transport report stated that the crash, which killed two and injured 105, could have been avoided if the pilot had applied full braking power four seconds earlier.

London - Britain's Labour Government was defeated by one vote in a motion of non-confidence in the House of Commons. The vote forced the calling of a national election in May. Conservative leader Margaret Thatcher is expected to defeat Prime Minister James Callaghan to become the nation's first woman Prime Minister.

Washington - An American consumer group has demanded that the U.S. government recall millions of hand-held electric hair dryers which may contain harmful amounts of asbestos that could be blown in the user's face. A survey has shown that 20 - 25% of the 50 million dryers in use on the continent may contain the cancer-causing asbestos.

Islamabad - Former Pakistani Prime Minister Bhutto lost his last bid to escape the death penalty as the Supreme Court rejected his appeal of the sentence. Bhutto had submitted petitions to the court challenging the legality of his detention and trial. He was found guilty of ordering the murder of a political opponent four years ago.

Layton to recite newest poetry

Special Renowned Canadian poet, Irving Layton, is appearing LIVE tonight at the John Deutsch Centre, at 8:00 p.m. in the Ceilidh Room. He'll be treating the Queen's community with a reading of his latest poetry.

Joining Layton is one of Italy's foremost contemporary painters Aliqi Sassu. A set of fifteen original etchings, inspired by Layton's newest poems will be on exhibition.

Sassu and Layton met in the winter of 1978 and each inspired the other's works. The resulting portfolio is titled "There Were No Signs".

The Layton-Sassu event has been organized by the Italian Cultural Institute of Toronto and the Kingston Dante Alighieri Society. The world premier exhibition and reading will be in the John Deutsch Centre.

Also at the exhibition will be an elegant bilingual edition of Irving Layton's The Tamed Puma, published in Italy in 1978. The Italian translations in this numbered, limited edition are by Dr. Francesca Valente, of the Italian Cultural Institute.

"Given Layton's earthy style and Sassu's progressive art this should prove to be a very entertaining learning experience," one expert said of the exhibition.

Alarm over accessibility

The Editor:

I would like to raise strong objection to a policy adopted by Outer Council on March 29, 1979. This policy was presented prior to its inclusion in a brief replying to the P.S. Ross Report, and has since been sent to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.
It supported the unpegging of Ontario tuition fees suggested within the Ross Report and condoned allowing individual institutions to charge tuition according to demand.

Unbelievably, this statement passed Outer Council and has now become official AMS policy. Having been long established, Queen's is obviously one of the Ontario Universities which stands to gain financially from increased tuition in the light of heavy demand. The main argument used by supporters of this policy was that, with more money to spend on programs, Queen's would avoid "mediocrity" and achieve "excellence". To me it is obvious that Queen's already enjoys a reputation for academic superiority. This is achieved by high academic entrance qualifications, not entrance criteria based on family income. Indeed, a qualification such as income can only exclude those who are academically well-qualified but lack the funds for tuition. The AMS is a student government. Whereas bodies such as Senate undoubtedly sense financial gain for Queen's, the student governments' stand should be one which advocates freedom of choice and equal accessibility to university education for all.

An accompanying argument for the option which passed was that OSAP would compensate for any increase in tuition fees thus maintaining accessibility. I submit that OSAP cannot efficiently handle even the present system. To suggest that OSAP grants would increase in line with tuition fee hikes in certain universities is to unrealistically presume such an action on the part of a government which preaches restraint. To support this policy is to admit to discrimination as students against other students, on the basis of a factor which should be irrelevant in an academic community; financial background.

Certain questions have to be asked, as a result of this policy having been passed. Does Outer Council really feel that students who can't afford unpegged tuition fees shouldn't be here? Or was the new Outer Council (with some members absent during voting) simply swayed by one or two eloquent speakers?

Whatever, we should be ashamed that such a regressive measure has been declared to be a representative opinion of the students at this university.

"262 Wellington"

Since this is the last "262" I thought it would be appropriate to create something special. The Queen's was good enough to allocate a half-page, but now that I have it, I don't know what to do with it...

Since it is not only the last "262", but, also the completion of my four years at University I have an overwhelming desire to be profound.
I'm sure Megan would want to do the same in Toronto so I'm not sure by the way and I friends
"going out"

...so if you read anything to the cafeteria in same group culture, don't believe it. All that aside, she's been my proverbial guiding light in this strip. Oh ya! Humilis is modeled off Kathleen Ross a 3rd year student and Mr. Brown's full name is Bill Brown, the guy with the voice on CROC

Leonardo da Smith is, of course, me.
All the other characters are first-timers, though I once saw this guy in the pub that looked just like Chuck. I would have painted this out to him if he had the resemblance been just in his face...

Well so far, I've registered zero on the philosophy scale. On well!
Why fight it? I will say, however, that Queen's isn't bad, a bit on the wimpy side as a student's voice on world affairs - but, it's not bad

I suppose that's all I really have to say, except maybe thank the all those who helped me on this strip, and to G.W. in spirit etc...

Oh ya! Save this "262" it'll be worth millions when I'm dead!

Oh ya! Save this "262" it'll
be worth millions when I'm dead!

Class besieged by groaning men

The Editor:

A discussion arose in a recent seminar, points of which I think should be shared with the larger university community. In this particular literature course all the authors are male, against which I have no complaint. Several of these authors use the myths, legends and stereotyped images of women in order to communicate their messages. This also is not objectionable in itself. What bothers me though is the reaction of several men in the class who groaned and took exception to the comments of a few women who recognized the stereotypes and tried to discuss their effects.

Why should women not question male portrayals of women's experience? Until recently, our cultural underpinnings had been created and interpreted almost exclusively by men. I think it must be an integral part of any social science course to listen to the feminist perspective and to how women really perceive and experience the world. It is no longer enough to have male psychologists, male politicians and male authors define women. Her experience is legitimate and it is in the interests of all for her to communicate it to male listeners. She is deserving of the same respect that she has given male creators of culture for the last five thousand years.

If you want the whole story, listen to the other half.

Time wasting, nattering and bickering

The Editor,

We would like to take this last opportunity to convey a message to a student "government" body on campus, A.S.U.S. Present at a meeting held Tuesday night last week to try and recover losses "incurred" at our Mardi-Groucho Dance, our eyes were finally painfully opened to the time wasting, nattering, bickering and ignorance displayed at that time.

The French D.S.C. finally this year made an effort to get the students moving, and to show to others on campus that we are not as apathetic as we have been termed. Unfortunately, our plan backfired - Bad timing? Or is it just plain apathy? No comment. But A.S.U.S. should be reprimanded for its unwillingness to back D.S.C. activities.

We acted in what the former assembly tried to push with their slogan:
"What is your D.S.C. doing?" Participation!

Thanks A.S.U.S. for a real eye opener - too bad it's too late! P.S. Good luck. Orientation on your red shorts and your Mardi-Gras

Grits emerge as asses in game of "pin the tail on the donkey"

The Editor,
This letter is in reply to Mr. Tinari's piecemeal coverage of Joe Clark's March 6th speech to La Chambre De Commerce De Montreal. This article was the epitome of journalistic fantasy.

The ill-founded attack criticizes "Clark's lack of background in Canadian energy policy" and constantly degrades the Progressive Conservative Party's Energy Policy. Very astutely, Mr. Tinari reminds Mr. Clark "that Canada's present energy policy, which was termed wasteful and inefficient by Mr. Clark, was in part formulated by the last Conservative government of Canada under Diefenbaker". Is that so? Well, Mr. Tinari you seem to be almost as confused as the present Liberal Government, but they've had a 16 year headstart, almost enough time to develop a National Energy Policy.

So where would you have the buck stop, perhaps Sir John A. Macdonald? Joe Clark points out recent Liberal policies by noting that "Eastern Canada relies on risky foreign sources for 60 per cent of its oil. Canada pays out 3.5 billion dollars in foreign exchange to cover that dependency on other countries' oil". If these funds were diverted to develop, as Clark proposes, a policy of "self-sufficiency" surely some of the 7.9 per cent of the labour force (The Unemployed) might be coaxed back to work and the Dollar (the old name for the 84 cent facsimile used today) would both benefit, if nothing else. The Progressive Conservative Party proposes an integrated use of "all the energy sources at our disposal: oil, gas, hydro, coal, nuclear, and solar as well as other renewable sources".

Mr. Tinari points out that the Conservatives proposed gradual replacement of oil by gas wouldn't succeed in the transportation industry, but successful conversion in other industries and for heating purposes would make more oil available for use in transportation. Remember also that certain types of coal can be converted to oil.

Mr. Tinari, with all respect, you have been playing pin the tail on the donkey but alas you have the wrong donkey. Take the blindfold off, the one you are looking for has a large 'L' on its behind, has a very confused look and is probably going round and round in circles saying "where am I".

A dissatisfied customer

The Editor,
As one who is completing his fourth year of study (I use the term loosely) at good old Q.U., I feel it is my right and privilege to comment on some of the events that have occurred here over the past four years.

I had some hope for the integrity of this institution when a motion was presented by AMS Outer Council to disband the Inner Council. Or was it the other way around? (Does anyone really care?) Nevertheless, it seemed as if the tide was turning against the bureaucracy in favour of responsible government. To use the words of one of the great minds of our time, John Belushi, "But, nooooo!" This motion was denied, but it has brought to the surface many interesting possibilities. If Outer Council disbands the Inner Council, then perhaps the Senate will disband Outer Council, the Administration will disband the Senate, and the Ontario Government will turn Queen's into a home for unwed mothers.

While I'm on the subject of mothers, I would like to thank those fine upstanding people responsible for having the foresight to prevent me from seeing those demons of darkness, the Battered Wives. However, I feel more could and can be done to preserve the virginity of the Queen's collective conscious.

Should not Long John Baldry be similarly banned for discriminating against short people?

Probably the issue that affects us all most deeply is that of the subject of alcohol. This university seems to be very hypocritical on the subject. They ban alcohol from football games on the basis of a few unfortunate drunken incidents, but allow inaneities like the Engineering Irish beer-drinking contest to continue, culminating in vandalism and vomiting. They expect us to be responsible adults when we drink, but treat us like children by having the Pub open for only four hours each night. Why not have the Pub operate as a normal bar would? Open at noon, close at 1 A.M.

Just a few more notes. The Tricolour is a good yearbook, but there's a lot of wasted space in it. The only good articles in Golden Words are the ones written by arts students. A potential outlet for creative artists, Sweven, has been discontinued because students from generally wealthy families (face it, there is a lot of money at this school) were not willing to part with 35 cents.

I'm getting depressed thinking about the inaneities of this school. I hope someone else will continue from where I left off.

Bill Kitcher.

Sexual intimidation study continues...

I wish to thank all those people who have assisted in the survey currently being conducted to determine the incidence of sexual harassment and sexual assault on the Queen's campus.

There are a few points about the survey which should be clarified at this time.

Many people have asked if we are only interested in things which have just happened. Indeed we wish to know of the current situation, but persons who have been on campus for a number of years may have experienced this type of thing in the past. We would like to have this information as well.

The telephone line will be operating until the end of the examination period in May and we hope that any member of the Queen's community will feel free to call and outline the details of any experience relating to these topics which they might have had.

It should be emphasized that it is not just students whom we wish to hear from - any member of faculty or staff who may have experienced or observed any type of assault or harassment on campus is invited to assist in the survey.

Many people did not realize that they would be calling a "machine". That is, all calls are recorded and later transcribed with any names that may have been mentioned omitted from the transcription. The tape is then erased. This is being done to ensure confidentiality and anonymity for all concerned. It also allows us to provide a 24-hour answering service. However, persons who wish to relate their experience personally, or anyone who might have questions about the survey, are invited to call or drop in at the Grey House. The same confidentiality is guaranteed.

I hope that this explanation will clear up most of the questions which have been asked over the past couple of weeks. If other enquiries arise, I would ask people to contact the Student Affairs Centre for assistance.

Once again, may I thank everyone who has taken the time to respond to the survey. Your cooperation and assistance are appreciated.

MacArthur: What's in a name?

Julian Cunningham
I was quite taken with MacArthur's production of Celebration Saturday night. So after the show, I sought to have a few words with the four leads.

What started as a routine interview rapidly turned into an issue.

The cast was deeply disappointed with the lack of publicity afforded their show (including the Journal's lack of coverage). Had I not seen the show, I would have protested. I saw it, and I listened.

Simon Leibovitz, MacArthur's student society president, tapped the depth of everyone's wound when he used the main campus slang "Mickey Arthur" to express the frustrating sense of alienation they felt from the rest of the University.

They were further frustrated by their inability to effect much change. Most of them are only here for one year.

Based on what I saw, and what we discussed (the cast and I), I would agree that West Campus goes largely unnoticed as part of Queen's.

In response to their frank concern, I can say this much as long as the students of MacArthur College seek to effect a closer bond with Main Campus, I will fully reciprocate next year in my capacity as Entertainment Editor of the Journal. I can only hope that others will read this and respond in the same way.

Wish for luck and unlucky

The Editor:
While exams, essays and assignments loom large for all of us, they are not everything. Perhaps this is an appropriate time to think about something a little bigger, beyond the self-centered, rushed atmosphere of University in April.

To provoke a little thought and a discussion about development problems in other parts of the world, the Women's Residence Council has set up a display and "Wishing Well" in the lobby of Victoria Hall.

The idea is to make a double wish - one for good luck on exams, the other in support of development programmes in the Third World.

All donations will go directly to Hayden Hall, a registered Canadian Jesuit Mission in Darjeeling, West Bengal, India. Its programmes include mother and child care, TB eradication, primary education, feeding and housing. The annual cost of running the centre is about $50,000. Most of the staff is native and the intent is to give them basic information on hygiene, diet and health care and then to spread them out into the community. Although it is a Catholic Mission, many of the staff are lay-people and the majority of these are Hindus and Buddhists.

While we are asking for monetary support of this charity through the "Wishing Well", our wider purpose is to give students something to think about. Exams are not the end of the world, so please drop by Vic lobby, read the information and make a double wish.

Beware imposters!

The Editor:
The Ontario March of Dimes is not currently conducting any door-to-door fund raising activities in the Kingston Area. Nor does it normally do so as it is a member agency of the United Way of Kingston and District.

It has been brought to the attention of the Ontario March of Dimes that persons have been soliciting funds, door-to-door, in its name. The March of Dimes suggests that if you are approached in this manner, that you report the incident to your local police department.

The Ontario Society for Crippled children, an organization distinct from The Ontario March of Dimes, is currently conducting its Easter Seal campaign and Roll-A-Thon. The Easter Seal campaign is conducted by direct-mail and the pledges for the Roll-A-Thon are taken by volunteers who carry adequate identification. Both are legitimate fund raising efforts.

Diamonds and Toads

Julia Grunau

My reasons for coming to Queen's were those of the classic Spoilt Brat. I liked the initial 'Q', I liked the Queen's colours, I liked the idea of being three hours away from home. But most of all I came for the limestone buildings, whose fame had reached the remote hamlet of Nobleton, which is the closest burg to my home (Nobleton has a feed store, not limestone, which is a Friday night hot spot.) I had never visited the campus before my excited arrival on September 9.

My first view of the campus was - naturally - the Mac-Corry parking lot. The Spoilt Brat in me rose up in swindled outrage. "Where are the limestone buildings?" I wailed. "They told me there were limestone BUILDINGS!"

In subsequent days I located the limestone buildings and was mollified. I discovered Theological Hall and went into happy convulsions. I also discovered that Eng

Soc did not stand for English Society, and that very quickly I discovered that Victoria Hall on Thursday nights leaves you breathless and reeling, from lack of sleep as much as external stimulus.

I began testing the University. Douglas Library got a fairy-tale book for me all the way from the University of Virginia! The Journal wanted me as a columnist! Golden Words wanted me dead!

Scholastically, I read Boccaccio, Chaucer, Wordsworth, Dante, Keats, Shakespeare, Petrarch, and Flaubert. Not scholastically I met Earle Birney, Karen Kain, Liana Boyd, and Narciso Yepes.

I can go home in the summer now and sit in the Nobleton feed store on Friday nights and regale my audience with tales of debauchery and sin in ladies' residences; with discussions of the talents of various Canadian performers; and with whispered vignettes telling of University Parties.

A challenge ahead for '79" grads

Paul Tinari

The recent events in Harrisburg clearly demonstrate that the new graduates in Physics and Engineering must now take their responsibilities towards society much more seriously. The nuclear power industry has been for many years telling the public how high its safety standards are and it is apparent that compared to many aspects of our modern society their standards are very high. But the events of this week clearly demonstrate that accidents do happen, and when it happens to a nuclear reactor, the results can be widespread and extremely disturbing.

The events of this year clearly imply that this year's graduates and those which will follow for the rest of the century will be challenged to produce new ideas as never before. Whether or not they can meet this challenge will determine the ability to which we adapt to the changes which will affect us all not only as Canadians, but as members of the world community.

The changing role of federalism in Canada will certainly be a problem for many of the graduates of the social sciences to work on, as are many other areas such as the future of bilingualism in Canada, the social climate of our large cities and the ever changing demographic patterns. These are problems which we as Canadians are facing, or will have to face in the years to come and it is to the solution of these problems which the graduates from Canada's institutions of higher learning will have to apply their acquired knowledge.

Douglas protects its secrets

The Editor:

Every institution which serves a large and varied assortment of people is bound to come under fire at one time or another. But often these complaints can be resolved through communication, pure and simple: once people are clear about the problem and the two sides of the matter are known, many complaints are dropped.

But communication with the Library staff is one-sided. They ask us for information in the form of questionnaires of various sorts. We comply, then await results, but it seems that none are forthcoming.

This is just preliminary to my real complaint however.

If a student needs a book which is not due back until sometime next year he must go through Library channels which are both inefficient and slow. He might get the book five days later; meanwhile he's been running to the Library daily to check if it's there. If he asks who has the book so he can get it himself, he is told that "The rules state that he may not be informed."

My solution is that the Library rescind its policy of top-secrecy concerning who has books on loan. This would make the retrieval of the book much speedier and the Library would be spared the expense of the salary they pay to whoever does the recalling and the postage involved in informing the various parties of what is going on.

A professor told me of his trips to and from the Library on one occasion. Once he finally picked the book up from the Library and got the reference he wanted from it he discovered that it had been recalled for him from the professor two doors down the hall from his office. Meanwhile they had both had to run back and forth to the Library, the Library had spent time and money recalling the book and days had been lost. Such a situation should be eliminated.

The art of political punditry

Colin Brown

Seeing that it is the journalistic fashion these days to make predictions regarding the upcoming federal election allow me to offer a few vignettes of wisdom myself.

Joe Clark will win. Read on. This gets funnier. Pierre Trudeau will lose. How? Because we are reaching our saturation point with the man. In one month's time his wife will be romping around the huts in his footsteps promoting her new book. Not only will he have to defend his public record, but his private one as well. Lotsa luck.

The issues will be ignored. Why? Refer to the previous paragraph. See what I mean?

Ed Broadbent's voice will finally change. John Diefenbaker and Flora MacDonald will kiss and make up on the Peace Tower steps in the interest of national unity.

Dalton Camp will be fired as Joe Clark's hairdresser. His replacement will be Maureen McTeer.

Jean-Luc Pepin will attempt to run in the Alberta riding of Bow River but will be repelled at boundary by border guards.

The practical joker who continues to send David Crombie Liberal policy announcements will be apprehended.

The riding of Oshawa will turf out Ed Broadbent in favour of the local Gay candidate. Paul Hellyer will replace him as leader of the N.D.P. Jack Horner will retain his seat.

Remember, friends, these are only the musings of one biased observer. You must make up your own mind. Enjoy your federal election campaign, but not too much. It only hurts when you laugh.

Orientation '79

The limits of the law

Carolyn Slater
Glen Davidson

At first glance an article on Orientation Week may seem out of place, in the last issue of the Journal when our minds are on exams. However, there is no better time to review the problems of Frosh Week 1978, in hope of preventing similar occurrences in September '79. For many years, Orientation Week was used to introduce Queen's spirit to the new students. Unfortunately, in the past few years, the Week has been marred by increased friction with the Kingston Police Force and has led to bad relations with the community.

Orientation 1978, though, one of the best run Frosh Weeks in recent memory will probably be best remembered for a few problems that occurred during the Week On campus, Orientation events were generally very well organized and caused few major problems.

The one exception occurred on the Wednesday night, when over one hundred complaints were registered over the noise levels at the outdoor dance in the MacIntosh-Corry parking lot. This was regrettable, as it was intended to reduce complaints by providing an "on-campus" activity for a large number of students both directly connected to the Week and those not connected.

Most of the remaining complaints during Frosh Week were caused by the actions of students off-campus. These extended from noise disturbances, vandalism and theft, to general rowdiness of students. Although they were the actions of only a few people, they reflect on the image of all Queen's students in the community.

While many of these incidents were intended as pranks, they had the potential for greater harm. For example, the theft of street signs and sewer covers can lead to traffic accidents involving innocent people. Not everyone appreciates a beer bottle thrown through their window or a motley crew of drunken students wandering through their flowerbeds late at night!

The greatest problem with the events surrounding last year's Orientation Week were associated with the "street parties" and the illegal sale of alcohol. The Liquor Licence Act of Ontario states, "no person shall keep for sale, offer for sale, or sell liquor except under the authority of a licence or permit issued by the Board." There are a large number of restrictions on obtaining a licence for such an event.

The two most obvious limitations are that the Liquor Licence Board of Ontario will not issue a special occasion permit for an event held in a private residence or place of abode or issue a permit for an event at which liquor is being sold for a gain or profit. Furthermore there is absolutely no way of legally 'getting around' these regulations by asking for donations, charging admission to the party or any similar scheme. Other restrictions are outlined in the actual Act.

There are other problems which arise directly from "street parties". One of these is the unlawful consumption of alcohol on public property. Another is the congestion of people in the streets. These may lead to damage to public and private property, personal injury, high noise levels, traffic hazards and general friction between the Kingston and University communities.

In addition to these problems Orientation '79 will have problems not encountered in previous years requiring the offender to appear in court, for contravention of the Liquor Licence Act (i.e. consumption of alcohol on public property).

In light of these problems, the organizers of the upcoming Week have taken several steps to try to remedy the situation. To alleviate the Age of Majority problem, the faculty orientations will be holding "two room" events wherever possible, one room to be licensed, the other not to be licensed but holding the entertainment. When "two room" events are not possible, "one room" events, dry or licensed, will be held, subject to the Liquor Licence Board of Ontario.

"no person shall keep for sale or sell liquor excepting under authority of a license"

The raise in the Age of Majority for Ontario will result in approximately one-third of all frosh being under-age and therefore unable to enter a licensed area.

As well, the city of Kingston is in the progress of enacting a new "Noise By-Law", which will cause the noise regulations to be enforced more strictly.

Through recent discussions with the Kingston Police, we have been given the impression that they will exhibit an increased presence in their surveillance both on and off campus, during Orientation Week. At the officer's discretion, they can issue summary conviction tickets, Admittance to any licensed areas will be restricted to those people who have attained the "Age of Majority". The A.M.S. constables will be advised to enforce this policy. As well, there will be several events for upper year students on campus sponsored by various student organizations. Admittance to these events will be restricted to upper year students only.

The A.M.S. Orientation Committee will be working both before and during the Week at continuing and furthering good relations between the Kingston Community and the Queen's student body.

During the Week, an Orientation

Hotline - 547-5835 and 547-5836 located in the Central Meeting Area of the John Deutsch University Centre - will be manned 24 hours a day, so that any student or resident of Kingston that has a question, problem or complaint can get answers and action fast. Where warranted the A.M.S. Orientation Committee will investigate the circumstances surrounding the inquiry and then report back to the individual concerned. According to Bylaw 11 of the A.M.S. Constitution, the A.M.S. Orientation Committee has been placed in the position to direct payment for damages caused by Queen's students during the Week both on-campus and off-campus and to charge for payment the individual or organization responsible. The Committee is trying to provide an alternative for the Community asking for Police intervention into complaints, but they will not interfere in the Police Department's execution of their duty.

The Committee has gathered information regarding the laws with respect to "street parties". If someone intends to hold a "party" the A.M.S. Committee asks that the individual call them first so they can have the opportunity to inform them of the legal aspects.

If you have any questions or problems before the Week you can contact us through the A.M.S. Office and during the Week remember 547-5835 and 547-5836.

Great Train Robbery

Mark Henderson

The Great Train Robbery is a well constructed, impressively staged slice of cinematic diversion. A ten million dollar bit of fluff to sit down with, give the head a rest, and kill off a couple of hours. Nothing is out of place or strikes a discordant note in this film. Sean Connery, Donald Sutherland, and Leslie-Anne Down play their roles smoothly, succeeding in getting the chuckles and laughs that the script calls for. Set in 1855, a daring heist is planned from a moving train that is carrying gold destined for British troops on the Crimean war front. Four special keys (each in the possession of different people) must be duplicated before the actual attempt, and Agar, the master lock picker (Sutherland) assumes the task. The dashing and respectable Edward Pierce (Connery) sets up each key theft, using his mistress Miriam (Leslie-Anne Down) as a seductive decoy, coyly disguised each time.

Directed and scripted from his own novel, The Great Train Robbery will likely establish Michael Crichton as a big time talent, a safe bet for large budgeted flicks that require a man who won't offend or disturb the movie masses and business interests. With Westworld and Coma under his belt, Crichton has turned from science fiction to history with great ease. No expense was spared to obtain the most acknowledged designer, cinematographer, and producer in the industry: Maurice Carter, Geoffrey Unsworth, and Dino de Laurentis. The Great Train Robbery develops a spectacular illusion of the past, a Golden era of British supremacy and bourgeois snobbery.

Pierce and Agar are professionals, so suave and calm that they never doubt the inevitable success of their scheme. Miriam possesses a plastic beauty and eerie coolness, extinguishing any fear that her various masquerades will fail to convince the unwitting individuals who succumb to her charms. With characters like these, Crichton has no trouble in presenting the most implausible of situations without straining our suspension of disbelief. He urges us to laugh along with the likeable low-lifers as they prepare to grab 25,000 British pounds of gold bullion. The movie is so far removed from "realism" that we simply don't notice the glaring incongruities and could care less.

The attempts to break the tight security on the gold-carrying train provide the funniest moments of The Great Train Robbery. Donald Sutherland is smuggled into the car with the gold in a coffin, with a dead cat to discourage any suspicious guards from opening it. He succeeds, but the smell of the cat just about does him in! Throughout the film, Sutherland mugs his role admirably, harkening back to his M-A-S-H and Kelly's Heroes characters. He and Connery play off each other with charming expertise, probably the best reason to go and see the film. Of course all ends well for our loveable trio, an irreversible requirement for this type of blockbuster. The Great Train Robbery is a pleasant way to procrastinate during exams - now playing at the Capitol theatre.

Celebration: sublime ridiculous

Julian Cunningham

Before I begin my analysis of Celebration, the musical that closed Saturday night in MacArthur Auditorium, let me say I am very sorry more people hadn't heard about it — because it was worth seeing.

Tom Jones's words and Harvey Schmidt's music have combined to create, amongst other things, The Fantastics, America's longest running play. Celebration, a later collaboration, though not as well known, is far richer, and more complex than its predecessor.

Celebration is a mysterious evocation of timeless pagan and Christian themes: the journey from innocence to experience, the eating of the forbidden fruit, and the rejuvenation of the earth, the seasons, and man.

Innocence is a boy named Orphan, played Saturday with great charm and openness by Kevin White. He meets Potemkin, a street-wise bum (Ian Juby). The time is New Year's Eve.

They meet Angel, a struggling young actress played by Janet McLachlan. Enter Mr. Rich, multi-million dollar producer of synthetic products, looking for someone to light up his life of boredom. The three misfits comply with a song. The show takes off.

In light of the show's inherent complexities, I was particularly pleased to see that every technical aspect of MacArthur's production was governed by a lovely simplicity; especially Steve Jude's versatile set. The musicians were onstage, hidden behind gauze screening.

As Mr. Rich, Renato Rizzuti gave us a delightfully casual, offhand cynicism. And Ian Juby's Potemkin, curious confidant and news-bearer, was energetic, and at times very commanding.

The show's only major disappointment was the masked chorus of weak choreography and uncomplimentary yellow body suits. Not nearly enough attention was paid to this group.

As Angel, Janet McLachlan wore the body costume well, and sang with infectious commitment.

The leads made any deficiencies in their acting and singing seem mere shadows under the light of their enthusiasm.

"The tunes weren't tuneful," said Kingston's "Major" newspaper. Wrong. Musical director Steve Couldridge and Co., brought an entrancing score to life with a degree of professionalism unusual to an amateur musical production.

The show left me warm, wistful and hungry for more. And that, I think, is a compliment. For an interesting afternote, see "MacArthur..." [pg 9].

Celebration's four leads.

We're tired but happy. It's been a year of awakening, the most valuable and lasting education possible. Thank you everyone at the Journal, especially Chris and Tim. Best wishes to Drew for next year — Patty and Brent.

Douglas Rain, a twenty-four year Stratford veteran, will appear in both parts of Henry IV and King Lear.

Richard Monette will appear in both parts of Henry IV, Love's Labour Lost and King Lear.

Julian Cunningham and Brent Lavictoire

For many students, the Stratford Festival is already a favorite summer haunt. And the 1979 festival would be a good place and time for others to discover exactly what it is all about. Because this season, perhaps more than any other, will offer a true sense of the enormous accomplishments and scope achieved by the playwright for whom it was built, William Shakespeare.

The lyrical poetry, abrasive psychology, allegorical journeys, and deepest darkest tragedies of Shakespeare are all here.

The premiere production of Steve Petch's "Victoria," and a revival of the musical "Happy New Year" will fill out the season which we have described in this special preview. The Journal will present ongoing coverage of the Festival beginning in June, and continuing through mid-October.

This will be the Journal's first year at the Festival.

RICHARD II

Shakespeare's deft study of a pathetically drippy monarch whose rambling poetic outbursts isolate him from his court, to whom he is an embarrassment.

The Stratford triumvirate of Frank Maraden, Nicholas Pennell and Stephen Russell will alternate in the leading role.

The director, Zoe Caldwell, will face a major challenge in the staging of a play whose action is predominantly verbal and psychological. With this cast, Richard II has the potential to win the critics, and viewers

EARNEST

Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest, a revival of the 1975 and 1976 productions, will be directed by the Festival's Artistic Director, Robin Phillips, one of three productions Mr. Phillips will oversee

this year

An elegantly comic tale involving a series of mistaken identities, The Importance of Being Earnest derives its popularity from Wilde's scintillating wit. While Algernon goes about "Bunburying", the rest of the characters, with the exception of Jack Worthing, are left to figure out the puzzle. The inevitable revelation and reconciliation provide the theatre with some of its greatest dialogue. Watch for William Hutt as Lady Bracknell playwrights, Edward Bond contends "violence is not a function of human nature but of human society". This is a North American premiere

OTHELLO

Alan Scarfe plays the impassioned Moor in this involving tragedy, acknowledged through centuries as one of Shakespeare's greatest works. Nicholas Pennell as Iago should provide the perfect counterpoint to Scarfe's robust role. Certainly this combination should provide the season with some of its most memorable moments.

Directed by Robin Fraser Paye, the cast will also include Domini Blythe, Barbara Budd, and Stephen Russell.

Othello explores the depths of the tragic hero who succumbs to his own hubris; it is a play of the triumph of evil through human jealousy.

THE WOMAN

Directed by Peter Moss and Uro Kareda, The Woman features some of the company's most experienced actors Max Helpman, Martha Henry as Hecuba, and William Hutt as Nestor, along with Susan Hogan and Jim McQueen, will be featured in this haunting drama.

The Woman, written by Edward Bond, takes the aftermath of the Trojan War for its subject matter and asks its audience inevitable and timeless questions about social and individual values. One of the generation's most controversial

HENRY IV Pt. I

Often regarded as Shakespeare's "perfect comedy", this play actually centres on the offbeat education of Henry's son, Prince Hal. On his symbolic journey to manhood and monarchy, Hal is initially discovered in low-life company, typified by his closest friend, the swaggering, boastful Falstaff.

The play brilliantly breaches the chasms of time, age, class and lifestyle through its rapid succession of contrasting scenes; structurally impeccable.

Veteran Douglas Rain and Richard Monette will assume the roles of Henry and Prince Hal respectively in both parts of Henry IV. For anyone unfamiliar with Shakespeare, this play would be a marvellous introduction.

HENRY IV Pt. II

Hal's rapid growth continues, as does the demise of his troubled father's kingdom. Elizabethan audiences had come to love Falstaff so much that they could not tolerate his death in this play, and Shakespeare was finally obliged to resurrect him in The Merry Wives of Windsor, a late comedy.

The second part of Henry IV is the production of Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale.

The Taming of the Shrew depicts, in the comic tradition, the incredible clash of wills between man and woman. The resulting high comedy is one of Shakespeare's finest creations.

This Third Stage production will be directed by Pamela Hawthorn

LOVE'S LABOUR LOST

final stage of Stratford's historically sequential trio, beginning with Richard II.

Much attention will probably be focussed on Douglas Rain, who comes to the title role with a distinguished background, including his controversially received interpretation of MacBeth at Stratford in 1978.

THE SHREW

Margot Dionne plays the lead role, Katherine, in this powerful tale of courtship and marriage. In her third season at Stratford, Margot has worked in the mediums of film and television as well as the live stage. After a series of minor roles in her first Stratford season, Ms. Dionne played Hermione in last year's

YERMA

Men and women. Desire versus convention. A provincial Spanish community. Federico Garcia Lorca's setting for his disturbing psychological study of the conflict between man and his own laws.

This is a third stage production under the direction of Pam Brighton opening Aug. 25. The cast includes Rod Beattie, Cedric Smith, Barbara Budd, Karen Austin and Jennifer Phipps. Cedric Smith also wrote the songs for this production.

KING LEAR

If you want to see it, get a ticket—quick. With its dazzling cluster of big names, this could well be Stratford's crowning touch. Take a look. Peter Ustinov as Lear, William Hutt as the Fool, Douglas Rain as Gloucester, Frank Maraden as Albany, and Richard Monette as Edmund. Take a second look. Robin Phillips will be directing.

For those who are skeptical about Ustinov's capabilities, consider this: King Lear's major focus is on an aging king and his curious fool. Their relationship is coloured with a humour that quietly hovers between tears and laughter. Ustinov displays an identically poignant humour in the film version of his play Romanoff and Juliet, a tragicomic love story.

In these uncomfortable days when imported stars are frowned upon by many Canadian professionals (but not by the public), let us view Ustinov's arrival at Stratford not as an intrusion, but as an education.

NED AND JACK

A revival of last year's festival production. Alan Scarfe repeats his role as John Barrymore in this moving tale of the strange friendship between the famous actor and the tragically incapacitated playwright Edward Sheldon, two of Broadway's most flamboyant characters during the twenties. Written by Vancouver playwright Sheldon Rosen, Ned and Jack received excellent reviews across North America for its compelling drama and Alan Scarfe's charismatic performance. Not bad for a play that came together entirely by accident.

The China Syndrome: A terrifying movie

Will it happen now? Tomorrow?

Editor's Note: The events of the last week at Three-Mile Island in Pennsylvania have signified a new era in Man's history. Technology has taken on a frightening dimension, something we haven't wanted to believe was possible for years. At press time the fate of the endangered nuclear reactor was still unknown. In many ways it has been an ironic week for the world. To add to the ironies: our feature last week was about the dangers of nuclear power; this review was written last Wednesday evening. Brent Lavictore

Don't let anyone tell you that Jane Fonda doesn't make political movies anymore (Coming Home should have already dispelled that myth).

The China Syndrome is a movie very much about politics. Not the grubby, underhanded politics that happen behind closed doors at a bureaucratic level, not the deceptive and incredibly corrupt power politics at a government level (something we've all come to associate with Watergate with). The China Syndrome is a movie about everyday politics, the politics of living in our modern society where the power and burdens of authority make a situation such as the one depicted in the China Syndrome entirely possible. It's about the politics of the working class man but it extends to the corporate and government levels of power.

Set and filmed on location in Los Angeles, the China Syndrome depicts a volatile controversy surrounding the Ventana Nuclear Power Plant, controlled by the CG and E power authority and the imminent construction of a similar plant by the same authority.

Take a talented but frustrated television newswoman, a similarly talented but not so "establishment" cameraman, a nuclear plant supervisor with a heavy conscience, a "this is costing us a half-million a day" chairman of the board, a station manager caught in the political machine, and add to the fringe areas a reactionary group who destroy their own efforts through childish displays, and you've got one helluva movie with enough realism to make you forget you're in a movie theatre.

Basically, the China Syndrome takes its terror from the possibility that through a combination of human error and mechanical failure, a nuclear reactor could self-destruct. If a spill were to occur within the reactor, the bottom would burn out and into the earth until it reached a water level (or China).

The resulting nuclear explosion would destroy an area "the size of Pennsylvania"; the destruction and fatality rate would depend on the wind direction. Not a pretty picture, eh?

Very obviously, in this movie at least, the system does not work. Because of a greedy contractor during the initial construction period a number of welds in the reactor housing have not been properly tested. After a minor earth tremor a fault in the system becomes graphically apparent in a small heavy water leak.

Filming a nuclear power feature for KXLA news that day, Jane Fonda (Kimberly Wells) and her cameraman Michael Douglas (Richard Adams) witness the plant's red alert and, illegally, film the crisis. The plot literally explodes when, during the hearings on the newly proposed nuclear plant, we find that people are willing to kill in order to keep key evidence out of the hearings. (This part of the plot is based on an actual case now before the courts in the United States).

In a brilliant style, director James Bridges frames the explosive main plot with the day-to-day trivialities of television news coverage. "Live Wire" singing telegrams and fish doctors at once offset the compelling drama engulfing the main characters and heighten its poignancy to an almost unbearable degree.

On a pure conflict level the film uses almost cliché stereotypes to further the confrontation. Though Jack Lemmon may unconsciously tell us, "I love that station", and though the immediately recognizable domination of millions of dollars over the safety of millions of lives is painfully misproportioned, the film doesn't lose a touch of its credibility.

Even the juxtaposition of the money game being unveiled by the newsteam with a TV game show (the one with the giant pinball machine) and the groaningly ridiculous advertisement for microwave ovens on the ever-present television screens don't release you from the film's total grip of horror. You may laugh in places but it will be a very unsettling laugh indeed. The middle man in the pinch makes it all entirely possible. Director of Photography, James Crabbe, and Editor, David Rawlings, have created a masterpiece of controlled, amazingly tight film. The camera angles inside the plant itself are kept to an acceptable degree (the plant derives its terror from the plot) and the editing is pointedly subjective. A definite news style of camera work transcends the genre. Hollywood has created. Especially during some of the more crucial scenes there exists a tension so tangible you can taste it.

Jack Lemmon, Jane Fonda, and Michael Douglas perform brilliantly; their on-screen rapport is rarely seen in film. So convincing is their collective performance that it is perfectly understood that their convictions are very strongly anti-nuclear. Indeed, with Michael Douglas producing this epic under Fonda's Company, the totality of the film's message is inescapable.

From the mildly comic opening scene to the stunning final television colour test pattern bars, the China Syndrome is a stomach knotting experience. It has redeeming values far exceeding the film's cost or expected gate. You simply cannot miss this film.

Record Reviews

Max Webster: A Million Vacations
reviewed by Brent Lavictore

Each of the previous Max Webster albums create their own distinctions. No two really sound alike. With their newest album, again, it's hard to draw parallels with any of the first three Max Webster albums.

A Million Vacations boasts surprisingly succinct production recorded at Phase One Studios in Scarborough. On an instrumental track "Moon Voices", the electronic medium is exploited to its full potential, it rates with the best the band has ever recorded. The rest of the tracks have just the right amount of punch without being obviously manipulative. The Webster band and John deNottbeck have utilized a subdued production method and the songs have to carry their own weight. In most cases the recordings on A Million Vacations are enormously successful in conveying an individual effect without relying heavily on production techniques.

Dave Myles has filled in quite nicely on bass and, though he doesn't contribute to the songwriting aspect of Max Webster, the rest of the boys are taking a more active part in that department. Kim Mitchell, vocalist and guitars, is only responsible for about half of the tracks on the album. If you've caught the Max Webster act during the last year you'll recognize some of the tracks on A Million Vacations but, even if you haven't the whole album has that incredible Max Webster stamp, a perfect touch of love song, hate song and the crazies.

Like most Max Webster albums, it is so "different" it may take some previous listeners a little time to get used to the new playings.

Not wanting to single out a highlight from the album, let it suffice to say that A Million Vacations provides ten tracks of highly individual, exciting listening material. If you're a Max Webster fan I'm sure you'll buy it anyway. If you've never given them a listen let me point out that they're probably the most innovative band around, in terms of studio recording and live presentation, Canadian or otherwise. In many ways they belong in the same class as The Tubes; while the listener enjoys the product, he can only conclude "Actual Operating Mechanism Unknown".

Joe Jackson: Look Sharp
reviewed by Brent Lavictore

Joe Jackson sounds like a lot of people, more because of what he is than how he does it. He calls his music "Spiv Rock" - A spiv, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, is "a shady character who avoids honest work and lives by his wits, esp. in black market traffic." To you and me, it easily translates into street rock, the modern version being punk rock.

Recorded "live" in the studio, with no instrumental dubbing, David Kershenbaum's production is sparse, bare-boned and highly reminiscent of the early Who albums. Look Sharp resembles the Kinks at times and, especially, Costello. But Joe Jackson doesn't have The Attractions playing with him and, aside from a similar sound, never approaches that degree of excellence.

Jackson must be a very frustrated young man. He vents enormous package though.

The best tracks on the album are "One More Time", featuring some meaty guitar work by Gary Sanford, and "Throw It Away", a real good rocker. "Pretty Girls" is a brilliant satire on Roy Orbison's classic "Pretty Woman". As a total package the album alternates nicely between anarchy, rock and roll and even strangely sentimental tracks.

An obvious comparison can be made to Costello's debut album, "My Aim is True". Look Sharp covers the same range with a close approximation to Costello's style and verve. What Jackson lacks is Costello's message. He is much more self-centered, his songs don't have the same universal application as Costello's.

Just the same, Look Sharp is definitely a "different" album, one intended for punkers but not of offensive to the general rock and roller.

Supertramp: Breakfast in America
reviewed by Brent Lavictore

"Predictable" is the key word in describing Supertramp's long awaited album. So predictable it's a total disappointment.

Nowhere on Breakfast in America is there a song that approaches the pure power and unity of most of the tracks on Crime of the Century or Crisis, What Crisis? Nor is there anything approaching the epic of their "Fool's Overture" on the Even in the Quietest Moments album. I suppose the most damaging comment I could make is that, having listened to the album several times over, there isn't a single song, line or riff that sticks in my memory - a stark contrast to the involving, delightful songs on their previous three albums.

Recorded entirely in Los Angeles, Supertramp has indeed "Gone Hollywood" as their opening track suggests. Though none of the songs on Breakfast in America are especially "bad", the album wallows in mediocrity, definitely not the Supertramp of days gone by.

"Take the Long Way Home" (a continuation of "Lover Boy" from the last album) and "Logical Song" are perhaps the best tracks on the album. Paradoxically, they represent what's wrong with Breakfast in America: they are indeed logical compositions; the whole effort reeks of a quickie production money in the bank with minimal effort.

What's more baffling is that the group seems fully aware of the blow their creativity has suffered ("Now watch what you say or they'll be calling you a radical/liberal fanatical criminal/Won't you sign your name, we'd like to see you're acceptable, respectable, presentable, a vegetable!") But in Breakfast in America is any indication, they have no intentions of breaking out of their rut. Chalk up another "supergroup" to that malady brought on by excessive glitter best referred to as the "Fleetwood Mac syndrome".

If this is "evolved rock" at its best let's hope the primitives (people like Tonio K.) rise and take over from the rock sophisticates, soon. What's really shocking about this album is that, with such an obvious commercial orientation, it's sure to sell millions. A valid comment about the entire industry I'd say.

Thank you to everyone who contributed to the Entertainment section this year; have a safe and happy summer. Good luck next year Julian and special thanks to my wife, Patty. Hi Mom[s].

Staff draws fire as editors speak out

With caffeine induced awakeness, rock'n'roll blaring into the early morning, and the aftermath of a cap war underfoot, it being last press night, memories of a year at the Journal are not hard to conjure up.

Beyond the actual production of the paper what has been most rewarding and memorable this year was the opportunity to get to know and work with this year's staff. Diligent, dependable, hardworking, fun-loving and sometimes slow, they have been responsible for putting together one of the finest Journals in years.

Displaying great stamina (between bouts of press-room loafing to recoup his resources) news editor Warren Everson showed dedication to the Journal above and beyond the call of the text books. Bringing organization and filing as well as training a topnotch crew of reporters were just a few of Warren's many contributions to the paper.

Our business manager Tim Cyr was an island of fiscal responsibility in our midst, providing us with the ads to keep us in the black despite the resistance of space-conscious section editors. Tim also exerted gentle pressure in order to keep our press-night donut excesses within limits of reason.

In her features section Joanna Dean kept Queen's students abreast of current issues and was particularly timely in her articles on nuclear energy and an ongoing immigration case. Joanna's ever present good humour despite the use of her desk for donut dispersal was welcome in the midst of the rest of us irritable journalistic types.

Academic workloads and the demands of being a section head took their inevitable toll this year as the entertainment, opinion, and sports sections each saw a new editor second term.

The individuals who took over these sections in second term were no slouches as they continued the high quality established by their predecessors.

Assuming the mantle of entertainment editor, Brent Lavictore made 'punk' a campus-wide word and in his search for the perfect resume material produced the best layout this side of Life magazine. His accomplices, wife Patty, and Julian Cunningham added to the quality of the section as well as the quality of press-night entertainment.

Taking over the sports section in second term was Chris Cuthbert who combined his passion for sports with the art of layout (which he thought he'd never learn) to provide a well rounded and comprehensive coverage of sports at Queen's.

Our new opinions editor Drew Fagan was able to unlearn all the things he picked up at the Commerce Chronicle, and brought a tight copy count, good layout and many pictures and graphics to his section. We hope his stint as editor of the Journal next year will not dim his interest in journalism.

Tom Mohr continued to provide the light and the human side in his news stories this year and he and Ross Finnie gave vent to their social concerns and literary ability in editorials which introduced the arena of world affairs to the Journal's backpages.

Ed Hore, besides continuing his popular cartoon strip Boodles, managed the newest section, the Graphics department. Outside of arguments over aesthetic principles with unenlightened editors, Ed's job was made easier by such talented artists as Karen Bennett, Steve Bowie, Janet Kearns, and Richard Row.

Despite last minute requests and butcher jobs performed at the printers due to bad copy counts our photo department maintained diplomatic relations with the rest of the paper. Photo Editor Roy McBey, his assistant Ruth Wentzel, photographer Chris "Multi-Flash" Woods and technicians Dave Brown and Mike Frazleigh ensured that people who only look at the pictures still read the Journal.

Nora Tseng has hammered away faithfully week after week in the Unclassifieds. On top of getting first crack at all the good deals and juicy ads she gets our undying gratitude.

Being left to near the last is no reflection on the contributions made by assistant news editors John Baktis and Beth McKenzie. John's hitting power added excitement to press night ball games (though his batting average with headlines was not as good) and Beth McKenzie definitely added a touch of class to the section. This year's news section saw probably the greatest number of talented writers in years as the likes of Eric Evans, Fudgie Fennel, Doug Ronson, Shelly Matson and Janet Brick, amongst many others provided readable and well researched news.

The rising of the sun and space constraints make it impossible to mention everybody we'd like to, so for all those unmentioned but deserving people thanks for a great year and see you back again next year (!).

Lest we forget

With the 1978-79 school year drawing rapidly to a close it is worth reflection upon some of the notable events and issues that occurred.

Few of us will forget the incidents of Orientation Week when ten students were charged by the Kingston Police for selling beer at two street parties. The crackdown by the police on frosh week activities led to an extensive re-evaluation of the Orientation program and hopefully similar confrontations between the Kingston community and Queen's students will be avoided in the future.

This was also the year for Queen's inter-collegiate athletics. No fewer than nine teams captured OCUA-OWIA championship titles and the Golden Gaels football team won the College Bowl. Coaches and returning athletes are optimistic of another banner year in 1979-80.

Students were also treated to an election this year for the AMS Executive. It was the first election in two years and only the second in the past four. Perhaps the presence of three teams and the over 40 percent voter turnout is indicative of renewed interest in university affairs and politics.

Though these events highlight the year's activities it is the issues confronting post-secondary institutions in Ontario that are of continuing concern.

Beginning with the Cabinet shuffle that deposited Dr. Stephenson at the helm of both the Ministry of Colleges and Universities and the Ministry of Education, students have become painfully and increasingly aware of the low priority the government accords to universities in Ontario.

The government has told us funding will continue to decline in real dollars and that they place the burden of financial responsibility with the individual universities, their students, and their graduates—anywhere but with themselves. It may be only a matter of time before Brock and Trent become victims of an era of expansion that became, as a result of inefficient government planning, an era of stagnation.

Cutbacks will continue to effect adversely the quality of post-secondary education in Ontario. Every student should recognize the consequences of further reductions in the funding given to universities. For without an articulate student voice opposing such cutbacks, a responsible and viable alternative will not be put forth.

Winter Sports Review '79

As if the fall season's heroics by Queen's intercollegiate teams was not enough, the winter months produced a further yield of impressive athletic achievements.

Four intercollegiate teams claimed top honours in Ontario while four other squads finished as runners-up.

Furthermore many individual performers culminated great years by qualifying for nationals finals.

The Winter sports review '79 is dedicated to those victorious and not so victorious athletes who represented Queen's and helped brighten up the winter months.

Hockey Gals record 4th title in 7 years

The hockey Gals completely dominated the OWIAA this season, regaining the championship for the third time in the past four years. After enjoying an undefeated season in which they outscored opponents 84-18, the Gals defeated Guelph and Toronto to win the trophy.

The gals were led by captain Janean Sergeant, winner of the Award of Merit (for dedication, sportsmanship and all-round consistency). But the team's success can be attributed to the spirit and enthusiasm of a dedicated group of athletes who worked hard all year. Each player contributed 100% to every victory, helping the Gals outclass the opposition and triumph easily.

Synchro stars retain OWIAA championship

The Synchro swim team, under the direction of rookie coach-advisor Sheila Murphy, capped an unprecedented 7th consecutive OWIAA championship. Actually the girls shared top honours this year with a McMaster squad bolstered by Queen's transfers.

During the season the Gals successfully defended their East, and Regional meet titles.

Celeste Jennings captured the OWIAA Senior Figures title at the finals and 8 girls combined to capture the Synchronized swimming team Event Championship.

Hitchon and Webster highlight indoor track

The men's indoor track team placed an exciting second to perennial winner Toronto at the OUAA Championship at Toronto's CNE faculty. Charlie Hitchon highlighted the final meet by setting a Canadian National Record in the 600 metre race during the OUAA championship.

Other individual winners were Dave Kuhn in the pole vault, Adam Shoemaker in the 5,000 metre run, and Jeff Storwick, Rob Miller, Jim Wilson, and Charlie Hitchon combined to capture the 4 x 400 metre relay.

The injury-riddled women's team placed a strong 4th, out of nine entries in the OWIAA championships held at Toronto. Personal bests were achieved by nearly every member of the team.

Anne Webster was the meet's outstanding performer winning the 1500 metre and setting an OWIAA and Canadian National Indoor record in the 1000 metres. She qualified for the Canadian championships and ran well.

Both men's and women's teams wish to express their sincere thanks to coaches Rolf Lund, Sue Bolton, Curt Bolton, Dave Grant and Mike Baird for their dedication and guidance.

Hockey Gaels left winning ways back in Sudbury

The Queen's Golden Gaels opened their season with two impressive wins in Laurentian but went winless throughout the remainder of the season. The team finished with a 2-10-4 record and placed fifth in the OUAA Eastern division.

Highlights of the season were the victories against Laurentian and a 6-6 tie with the division winners, the University of Toronto Blues.

Ron Davidson was selected to the OUAA all star team while Paul Stothart and John MacIntyre challenged for the scoring title finishing second and third to Toronto's Cary Farelli.

MacIntyre was selected as the MVP for 78-79. Somewhat disappointing this year their prospects look good for next year with most of the players returning.

Squash squads finish first and second

The women's squash team displayed strength throughout the season and concluded the year by capturing the OWIAA Championship Series without a match loss.

The gals recorded victories in designated tournaments at Queen's, Waterloo and Trent.

The team received superb season performances from Jane Forbes, Roberts, Claire Smith, Natalie Sneyd, Sandra Koerner and Cathy Johnston. Forbes-Roberts captured the women's individual championship as well.

The men's team posted an excellent year after a 1 year absence on the OUAA scene. The squad placed second to the perennially powerful University of Western Ontario squad, regarded as one of the best teams in North America.

Paul Austin, Kim Grover, Jeff Tory, Nigel Costeloe and Sam Guderwill formed the best team that Queen's has ever fielded.

Basketball programs progress

Under the direction of rookie coach Tom Frood the Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team ended their most successful season in many years. Despite an overall record of 2-10 in league play the Gaels showed signs of future stardom.

The Gaels lost three games by under 8 points and in one other match were tied at the half with the strong University of Toronto Blues.

The Gaels, who have twelve of fourteen players returning next year did not have the extra poise and experience this season to win the close games.

The close defeats of this year should turn into victories next season if the development of players continues.

With Coach Frood leading the rejuvenated basketball program and student interest renewed the Queen's basketball program took a big step forward in '79.

Although the women played some very good games, they faced tough competition in the strong Tier 1 league and consequently finished sixth in the league. They were eliminated in the semi-finals of the OWIAA championships.

Athlete of the Week

As our intercollegiate season comes to a close, Queen's athletes and fans can give themselves a tremendous round of applause. Not only did we have our "winningest" season ever, but we captured TEN championships in the process.

Along with the fantastic team performances there were many outstanding individual efforts, many of which were noted in this column. In all we had 62 "Athletes of the Week" and innumerable nominations. Success breeds success. Congratulations Queen's "Athletes of the Week" - You did us proud!

Ski men are tops again

For the third consecutive year, the ski Gaels won the OUAA championship. Queen's and Western finished in a dead heat, with 39 out of a possible 40 points, but Queen's won on aggregate points.

Queen's won because of a consistently strong effort. Each member could ski full-out knowing that the team's depth of talent could overcome individual mistakes.

Peter Flowers, Dave Beatty and Kevin Titus led the Gaels, often finishing in the top ten in either the slalom or giant slalom.

The women's team, competing against powerful squads from Western and Waterloo, managed to gain fifth place in the OWIAA final standings. Queen's enjoyed some outstanding individual achievements in the series of races.

Two Gaels finished close to the top in the individual standings. Nancy Firstbrook captured 3rd place with 32 points followed closely by Nancy Esson with 31 points. The team made a strong showing at the OWIAA finals, but could not overcome the early season lead of the other schools.

Golden grapplers best in 8 years

The Golden Grapplers wrestled through another season against tough competition managing to finish 6th in the OUAA championships. Queen's was able to gain their highest amount of points in eight years.

Chris Thomas won a bronze medal in the 61 kg weight class, the largest class in the tournament. Brian Knox also captured a bronze following a last-second victory in the 100 kg class.

The Grapplers were pleased with their success and hope that a larger contingent of Queen's wrestlers will improve their placing next year.

Strong season for nordic skiers

The men's cross country ski team narrowly missed gaining second place in the OUAA standings but settled for third. A nucleus of experienced veterans and talented rookies performed well throughout the season, placing well in the season's racing. Queen's won its own invitational in February.

The X-country men were led by Hugh Tafell, Gord Skrecky and Derek Evans in the finals all finishing in the top eleven in the 15 km race and third in the relay.

The Gaels cross-country team enjoyed a surprisingly successful season. Composed primarily of rookies, the Gaels grabbed second place at the OWIAA championships.

Queen's nordic skiers placed consistently well during the season and excelled in the finals. Connie Nehr, Barb Olmstead and Chris Bowlby finished 3rd, 6th, and 7th in the 5 km race and helped the relay team to a 1st place finish. Bowlby has since been selected as the female winner of the Alfie Pierce trophy for contributions to intercollegiate athletics by a first year student.

Sports S-5

Depth a key for Queen's figure skating future

The Queen's figure skating team was third at their own invitational meet held in January. The final was a hard-fought battle with the Gaels (and a couple Gaels) finished third. Competition has improved immensely in the past few years and Queen's has been unable to dominate the OWIAA.

The highlight for the Gaels was the Synchronized Group Number, which Queen's won handily. The twelve skaters executed a precision performance that electrified the crowd! With strong depth, the team is hoping to triumph next year.

DAB

Queen's strongest swim team places 5th in Ontario

Queen's was represented this year by the strongest men's swim team in the history of the school. Their fifth place finish at the OUAA championships was particularly impressive given the high calibre of competition found at the university level.

Many members of the Canadian national swim team now compete for Canadian universities such as Waterloo, Toronto, Lakehead and Alberta.

Four Gaels swam at the CIAU championships with Bubbles Lawrynick winning a bronze medal in the 200 M breaststroke. Tim Dennis, the team leader and its best performer over the last four years will be sorely missed next year as will veterans George Bovell, Joe Schnitter and Ken Davies.

The women's swim team placed a very creditable 5th out of 11 teams at the OWIAA Championships. Diana Harrison, Cathy Masson and Carla Pepplar qualified for the CIAU finals.

In diving, Eve Wah qualified for the CIAU nationals as well.

Epee fencers qualified for OUAA finals

The men's fencing team placed reasonably well in the knockout playoff system with the epee team qualifying for the OUAA championships. Unfortunately they could not pull off a victory.

Scott Scheurmann, Gregor Smith and Gord Kubanek led the epee team. Kubanek also qualified for the individual final. Ron Walker led the foil team.

The women's foil team, competing in a strong league, qualified three fencers for the OWIAA championships. Veteran Mary-Jane Baldwin was the leading fencer for the Gaels.

Badminton squads second and third

The men's badminton team, with excellent depth, won the East Sectionals and placed 2nd to a strong team of national players from Waterloo, at the OUAA championship.

The women's team started the season with a strong second at the pre-Christmas OWIAA competition, and a first place finish at the East Sectional. They concluded the season in third place in OWIAA championship standings.

Four gymnasts of national calibre

The Queen's Gymnastics team entered the OUAA finals with ambitions to place second behind the perennially powerful York Yeomen.

The Gaels turned in a strong performance at the OUAA's held at Queen's but were nipped out for second place by the U of Toronto squad.

Coach Jamie Archibald is to be commended for moulding the 7 man team into a contender.

Four competitors attained the CIAU standards and two were selected and attended the CIAU Championship in British Columbia.

The women's gymnastics team under the direction of coach Jane Milliken placed 6th overall at the OWIAA championship and sent one competitor, Jayne McNeil to the

Hamel

CIAU championship also in British Columbia

Vball Gaels spiked by Western

Woods

The Men's Volleyball team emerged as East Section Champions but were defeated by Western in the finals. Probably the best Queen's volleyball team ever led with strong spiking by Henke Meijer, Glen Marham, and Peter Skalski. Dave Morton, Brian Macleod, Biraj Bora, and Mike Cooper provided the team with an impenetrable defense. Queen's is ranked third in the nation.

This was a rebuilding year for the women's volleyball team. A large quota of inexperienced rookies gained experience playing in the strong Ontario Tier I League which eventually produced the Canadian Champions. Queen's gals, under the guidance of Donna Gallagher, finished a respectable sixth in the overall standings. And next year with a strong nucleus of experience the team expects to better their performance.

Archery team on target

An improving young archery team placed second in the Winter OWIAA Championships after recording a 4th place finish in the fall.

The second place finish was the best showing in 6 years by the girls. The highlight of the finals was the outscoring of perennial champions Toronto on day 1.

The winter team was composed of Laurie Biddell, Marie Iwanik, Connie Grabtas, Chris Jennis, Carolyn Grant and Patti Walker.

Queen's curlers swept away

The men's curling team started the season strongly under the direction of skip Brent Stackhouse. However strong teams from R.M.C., Toronto and McMaster blocked Queen's effort to reach the Ontario finals.

The women's curling team played well in the season bonspiels but were unable to put it all together at the OWIAA playoffs. Sheryl Keely, skip of the women, was awarded the PHE Alumnae '55 Trophy for outstanding scholastic and athletic achievement.
